

This edition, consisting of 4 copies on Vellum,

5 copies on Van Gelder paper,
50 copies on Japan paper,
425 copies on Dickinson paper, was printed from type in the month of October, 1890.

Theo. L. DeVinne & Co.

This copy is No.

HORACE WALPOLE

A MEMOIR

WITH AN APPENDIX OF BOOKS PRINTED AT THE STRAWBERRY HILL PRESS

BY AUSTIN DOBSON

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS BY PERCY AND LÉON MORAN

NEW-YORK
DODD, MEAD & COMPANY
1890

6

1890

Copyright, 1890,
By DODD, MEAD & COMPANY.

'THE LARGEST'
1890

✓

THE DE VINNE PRESS.

ΦΙΛΟΒΙΒΛΟΙΣ ΦΙΛΟΒΙΒΛΟΣ

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE

‘ GROLIER CLUB

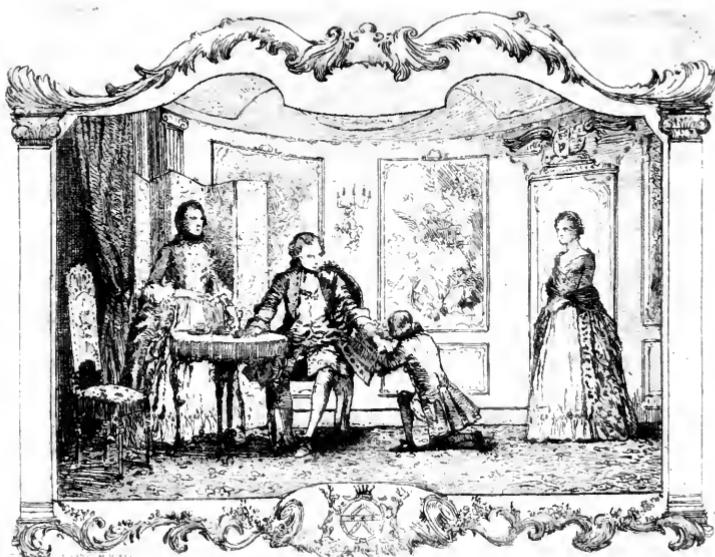

THIS MEMOIR OF A BYGONE

BOOK-LOVER, PRINTER, AND MAN-OF-LETTERS

IS CORDIALLY INSCRIBED

CHAPTER I.

The Walpoles of Houghton; Horace Walpole born, 24 September, 1717; Lady Louisa Stuart's story; scattered facts of his boyhood; minor anecdotes,—“la belle Jennings,” the bugles; interview with George I before his death; portrait at this time; goes to Eton, 26 April, 1727; his studies and school-fellows; the “triumvirate,” the “quadruple alliance”; entered at Lincoln's Inn, 27 May, 1731; leaves Eton, September, 1734; goes to King's College, Cambridge, 11 March, 1735; his university studies; letters from Cambridge; verses in the GRATULATIO; verses in memory of Henry VI; death of Lady Walpole, 20 August, 1737.

I.

THE Walpoles of Houghton in Norfolk, ten miles from King's Lynn, were an ancient family tracing their pedigree to a certain Reginald de Walpole who was living in the time of William the Conqueror. Under Henry II, there was a Sir Henry de Walpol of Houton and Walpol; and thenceforward an orderly procession of Henrys and Edwards and Johns (all "of Houghton") carried on the family name to the coronation of Charles II, when, in return for his vote and interest as a member of the Convention Parliament, one Edward Walpole was made a Knight of the Bath. This Sir Edward was in due time succeeded by his son, Robert, who married well, sat for Castle Rising,* one of the two family boroughs (the other being King's Lynn, for which his father had been member), and reputably filled the combined offices of county magnate and colonel of militia. But his chief claim to distinction is that his eldest son, also a Robert, afterwards became the famous statesman and Prime Minister to whose "admirable prudence, fidelity, and success" England owes her prosperity under the first Hanoverians. It is not, however, with the life of "that corrupter of parliaments, that dissolute tipsy cynic, that courageous lover of peace and liberty, that great citizen, patriot, and statesman"—to borrow a passage from one of Mr. Thackeray's graphic vignettes—that these pages are concerned. It is more material to their purpose to note that in the year 1700, and on the 30th day of July in that year (being the day of the death of the Duke of Gloucester, heir presumptive to the crown of England), Robert Walpole junior, then a young man of three-and-twenty, and late scholar of King's College, Cambridge, took to himself a wife. The lady chosen was Miss Catherine Shorter, eldest daughter of John Shorter of Bybrook, an old Elizabethan red-brick house near Ashford in Kent. Her grandfather, Sir John Shorter, had been Lord Mayor of London under James II, and her father was a Norway timber merchant, having his wharf and counting-house on the Southwark side of the Thames, and his town residence in Norfolk Street, Strand, where, in all probability, his daughter met her future husband.* They had a family of four sons and two daughters. One of the sons, William, died young. The third son Horatio† or Horace, born, as he himself tells us, on the 24th September, 1717, O. S., is the subject of this memoir.

* Another member for Castle Rising was Samuel Pepys, the Diarist.

With the birth of Horace Walpole is connected a scandal so industriously repeated by

* See note to page 107.

† "The name of Horatio I dislike. It is theatrical; and not English. I have, ever since I was a youth, written and subscribed Horace, an English name for an Englishman. In all my books (and perhaps you will think of the numerous Horatius) I so spell my name" (Walpoliana, i, 62).

his latter biographers, that (although it has received far more attention than it deserves) it can scarcely be left unnoticed here. He had, it is asserted, little in common, either in tastes or appearance, with his elder brothers Robert and Edward, and he was born eleven years after the rest of his father's children. This led to a suggestion, which first found definite expression in the Introductory Anecdotes supplied by Lady Louisa Stuart to Lord Wharncliffe's edition of the works of her grandmother, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu.* It was to the effect that Horace was not the son of Sir Robert Walpole, but of one of his mother's admirers, Carr, Lord Hervey, elder brother of Pope's "Sporus," the Hervey of the Memoirs. It is advanced in favour of this supposition that his likeness to the Herveys, both physically and mentally, was remarkable; that the whilom Catherine Shorter was flighty, indiscreet, and fond of admiration; and that Sir Robert's cynical disregard of his wife's vagaries, as well as his own gallantries

* It is also to be found asserted as a current-story in the Note Books (unpublished) of the Duchess of Portland, the daughter of Edward Harley, 2nd Earl of Oxford, and the "noble, lovely, little Peggy" of her father's friend and protégé, Matthew Prior.

(his second wife, Miss Skerret, had been his mistress), were matters of notoriety. On the other hand there is no indication that any suspicion of his parentage ever crossed the mind of Horace Walpole himself. His devotion to his mother was one of the most consistent traits in a character made up of many contradictions; and although between the frail and fastidious virtuoso and the boisterous, fox-hunting Prime Minister there could have been but little sympathy, the son seems nevertheless to have sedulously maintained a filial reverence for his father, of whose enemies and detractors he was, until his dying day, the implacable foe. Moreover, it must be remembered that, admirable as are Lady Stuart's recollections, in speaking of Horace Walpole, she is speaking of one whose caustic pen and satiric tongue had never spared the reputation of the vivacious lady whose granddaughter she was.

With this reference to what can be, at best, but an insoluble question, we may return to the story of Walpole's earlier years. Of his childhood little is known beyond what he has himself told in the Short Notes of my Life which he drew up for the use of Mr. Berry, the nominal editor of his works.* His godfathers, he says, were the Duke of Grafton and his father's second brother, Horatio, who afterwards became Baron Walpole of Wolterton. His godmother was his aunt, the beautiful Dorothy Walpole, who escaping the snares of Lord Wharton, as related by Lady Stuart, had become the second wife of Charles, second Viscount Townshend. In 1724, he was "inoculated for the small-pox"; and in the following year was placed with his cousins, Lord Townshend's younger sons, at Bexley in Kent, under the charge of one Weston, son to the Bishop of Exeter of that name. In 1726, the same course was pursued at Twickenham, and in the winter months he went to Lord Townshend's. Much of his boyhood, however, must have been spent in the house "next the College" at Chelsea, of which his father became possessed about 1722. It still exists, with but little alteration, as the infirmary of the hospital, and Ward No. 7 is said to have been its drawing-

* These, hereafter referred to as the Short Notes, are the chief authority for three parts of Walpole's not very eventful life. They were first printed with the concluding series of his Letters to Sir Horace Mann, 2 vols., 1844, and are reprinted in Mr. Peter Cunningham's edition of the Correspondence, vol. i (1857), pp. lxi-lxxvii.

room. With this, or with some other reception-room at Chelsea, is connected one of the scanty anecdotes of this time. Once, when Walpole was a boy, there came to see his mother one of those formerly famous beauties chronicled by Anthony Hamilton — “la belle Jennings,” afterwards Duchess of Tyrconnell. At this date she was a needy Jacobite seeking Lady Walpole’s interest in order to obtain a pension. She no longer possessed those radiant charms which under Charles had revealed her even through the disguise of an orange-girl; and now, says Walpole, annotating his own copy of the Memoirs of Grammont, “her eyes being dim, and she full of flattery, she commended the beauty of the prospect; but unluckily the room in which they sat looked only against the garden-wall.” *

Another of the few events of his boyhood which he records, illustrates rather the old proverb that “One half of the world knows not how the other half lives” than any particular phase of his biography. Going with his mother

* Cunningham, i, 36, and ix, 519. The Duchess of Tyrconnell’s portrait, copied by Milbourn from the original at Lord Spencer’s, was one of the prominent ornaments of the Great Bedchamber at Strawberry Hill (See A Description of the Villa, etc., 1774, p. 138).

to buy some bugles (beads), at the time when the opposition to his father was at its highest, he notes that having made her purchase,—beads were then out of fashion, and the shop was in some obscure alley in the City where lingered unfashionable things,—Lady Walpole bade the shopman send it home. Being asked whither, she replied “To Sir Robert Walpole’s.” “And who”—rejoined he coolly—“is Sir Robert Walpole?” * But the most interesting incident of his youth was the visit he paid to the King which he has himself related in Chapter i of the Reminiscences. How it came about he does not know, but at ten years old an overmastering desire seized him to inspect His Majesty. This childish caprice was so strong that his mother, who seldom thwarted him, solicited the Duchess of Kendal (the maîtresse en titre) to obtain for her son the honour of kissing King George’s hand before he set out upon that visit to Hanover from which he was never to return. It was an unusual request, but being made by the Prime Minister’s wife could scarcely be refused. To conciliate etiquette and avoid precedent, however, it was arranged that the audience should be in private and at night. "Accordingly, the night but one before the King began his last journey [i.e., on 1 June, 1727], my mother carried me at ten at night to the apartments of the Countess of Walsingham [Melusina de Schulemberg, the Duchess's reputed niece], on the ground floor, towards the garden at St. James's, which opened into that of her aunt . . . apartments occupied by George II after his Queen's death, and by his successive mistresses, the Countesses of Suffolk [Mrs. Howard] and Yarmouth [Madame de Walmoden]. Notice being given that the King was come down to supper, Lady Walsingham took me alone into the Duchess's ante-room, where we found alone the King and her. I knelt down and kissed his hand. He said a few words to me, and my conductress led me back to my mother. The person of the King is as perfect in my memory as if I saw him but yesterday. It was that of an elderly man, rather pale, and exactly like his pictures and coins; not tall; of an aspect rather good than august; with a dark tie-wig, a plain coat, waistcoat and breeches of snuff-coloured cloth, with stockings of the same colour, and a blue ribband over all. So entirely was he my object that I do not believe I once looked at the Duchess, but as I could not avoid seeing her on entering the room, I remember that just beyond His Majesty stood a very tall, lean, ill-favoured old lady; but I did not retain the least idea of her features nor know what the colour of her dress was."* In the Walpoliana (p. 25) † Walpole is made to say that his introducer was his father, and that the King took him up in his arms and kissed him. Walpole's own written account is the more probable one. His audience must have been one of the last the King granted, for, as already stated, it was almost on the eve of his departure; and ten days later when his chariot clattered swiftly into the court-yard of his brother's palace at Osnabrück, he lay dead in his seat, and the reign of his successor had begun.

* Walpole to the Miss Berrys, 5 March, 1791.

Although Walpole gives us a description of George I, he does not, of course, supply us with any portrait of himself. But in Mr. Peter Cunningham's excellent edition of the Correspondence, * Reminiscences of the Courts of George the First and Second, in Cunningham's Corr. i, xciii - xciv.

† The book referred to is a "little lounging miscellany" of notes and anecdotes by John Pinkerton, and was published by Bensley soon after Walpole's death. It requires to be used with caution (see Quarterly Review, vol. lxxii, No. cxliv); and must not be confused with Lord Hardwicke's privately printed Walpoliana, 1783, which relate to Sir Robert Walpole.

there is a copy of an oil-painting belonging (1857) to Mrs. Bedford of Kensington, which, upon the faith of a Cupid who points with an arrow to the number ten upon a dial, may be accepted as representing him about the time of the above interview. It is a full length of a slight, effeminate-looking lad in a stiff-skirted coat, knee breeches, and open-breasted laced waistcoat, standing in a somewhat affected attitude at the side of the afore-mentioned sun-dial. He has dark, intelligent eyes, and a profusion of light hair curling abundantly about his ears and reaching to his neck. If the date given in the Short Notes be correct, he must have already become an Eton boy, since he says that he went to that school on the 26th April, 1727, and he adds in the Reminiscences that he shed a flood of tears for the King's death when, "with the other scholars at Eton College," he walked in procession to the proclamation of his successor. Of the cause of this emotion he seems rather doubtful, leaving us to attribute it, partly to the King's condescension in gratifying his childish loyalty, partly to the feeling that as the Prime Minister's son it was incumbent on him to be more concerned than his schoolfellows, while the spectators, it is hinted, placed it to the credit of a third and not less cogent cause—the probability of that Minister's downfall. Of this, however, as he says, he could not have had the slightest conception. His tutor at Eton was Henry Bland, eldest son of the master of the school. “I remember,”—says Walpole, writing later to his relative and schoolfellow Conway,—“when I was at Eton, and Mr. Bland had set me an extraordinary task, I used sometimes to pique myself upon not getting it, because it was not immediately my school business. What! learn more than I was absolutely forced to learn! I felt the weight of learning that, for I was a blockhead and pushed up above my parts.” That, as the son of the great Minister, he was pushed, is probably true; but, despite his own disclaimer, it is clear that his abilities were by no means to be despised. Indeed one of the pièces justificatives in the story of Lady Louisa Stuart, though put forward for another purpose, is distinctly in favour of something more than average talent. Supporting her theory as to his birth by the statement that in his boyhood he was left so entirely in the hands of his mother as to have little acquaintance with his father, she goes on to say that “Sir Robert Walpole took scarcely any notice of him, till his proficiency at Eton School, when a lad of some standing, drew his attention, and proved that, whether he had, or had not, a right to the name he went by, he was likely to do it honour.”* Whatever this may be held to prove, it certainly proves that he was not the blockhead he declares himself to have been.

Among his schoolmates he made many friends. For his cousins, Henry (afterwards Marshal) Conway and Lord Hertford, Conway’s elder brother, he formed an attachment which lasted through life, and many of his best letters were written to these relatives. Other associates were the later lyrist, Charles Hanbury Williams, and the famous wit, George Augustus Selwyn, both of whom, if the child be father to the man, must be supposed to have had unusual attractions for their equally witty schoolmate. Another contemporary at school, to whom, in after life, he addressed many letters, was William Cole, subsequently to develop into a laborious antiquary, and probably already exhibiting proclivities towards “tall copies” and black letter. But his chiefest friends, no doubt, were grouped in the two bodies christened respectively the “triumvirate” and the “quadruple alliance.”

* This is quoted by Mr. Hayward and others as if the last words were Sir Robert Walpole’s. But Lady Stuart says nothing to indicate this (Lady Mary Wortley Montagu’s Letters, etc., 1887, i, xciii).

Of these the “triumvirate” was the less important. It consisted of Walpole and the two sons of Brigadier-General Edward Montagu. George, the elder, afterwards M. P. for Northampton, and the recipient of some of the most genuine specimens of his friend’s correspondence, is described in advanced age as “a gentleman-like body of the vieille cour,” usually attended by a younger brother, who was still a midshipman at the mature age of sixty, and whose chief occupation consisted in carrying about his elder’s snuff-box. Charles Montagu, the remaining member of the “triumvirate,” became a Lieut.-General and Knight of the Bath. But it was George, who had “a fine sense of humour, and much curious information,” who was Walpole’s favourite. “Dear George”—he writes to him from Cambridge—“were not the playing fields at Eton food for all manner of flights? No old maid’s gown, though it had been tormented into all the fashions from King

James to King George, ever underwent so many transformations as those poor plains have in my idea. At first I was contented with tending a visionary flock, and sighing some pastoral name to the echo of the cascade under the bridge. How happy should I have been to have had a kingdom only for the pleasure of being driven from it, and living disguised in an humble vale! As I got further into Virgil and Clelia, I found myself transported from Arcadia to the garden of Italy, and saw Windsor Castle in no other view than the Capitoli immobile saxum." Further on he makes an admission which need scarcely surprise us. "I can't say I am sorry I was never quite a schoolboy: an expedition against bargemen, or a match at cricket, may be very pretty things to recollect; but, thank my stars, I can remember things that are very near as pretty. The beginning of my Roman history was spent in the asylum, or conversing in Egeria's hallowed grove; not in thumping and pummelling King Amulius's herdsmen."* The description seems to indicate a schoolboy of a rather refined and effeminate type, who would probably fare ill with robuster spirits. But Walpole's social position doubtless preserved him from the persecution which that variety generally experiences at the hands — literally the hands — of the tyrants of the playground.

* Letter to Montagu, 6 May, 1736.

The same delicacy of organisation seems to have been a main connecting link in the second or “quadruple alliance” already referred to — an alliance, it may be, less intrinsically intimate, but more obviously cultivated. The most important figure in this quartet was a boy as frail and delicate as Walpole himself, “with a broad, pale brow, sharp nose and chin, large eyes, and a pert expression,” who was afterwards to become famous as the author of one of the most popular poems in the language, the Elegy written in a Country Church Yard. Thomas Gray was at this time about thirteen, and consequently somewhat older than his schoolmate. Another member of the association was Richard West, also slightly older, a grandson of the Bishop Burnet who wrote the History of My Own Time, and son of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. West, a slim, thoughtful lad, was the most precocious genius of the party, already making verses in Latin and English, and making them even in his sleep. The fourth member was Thomas Ashton, afterwards Fellow of Eton College and Rector of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate. His friendship with Walpole was not prolonged in later life, and he fades early out of the group which may be pictured sauntering arm in arm through the Eton meadows, or threading the avenue which is still known as the “Poet’s Walk.” Each of the four had his sobriquet, either conferred by himself or by his schoolmates. Walpole was Tydeus, Gray, Oromades, West, Almanzor, and Ashton, Plato.

On 27 May, 1731, Walpole was entered at Lincoln’s Inn, his father intending him for the law. “But”—he says in the Short Notes—“I never went thither, not caring for the profession.” On 23 September, 1734, he left Eton for good, and no further particulars of his school-days survive. But that they were not without their pleasant memories may be inferred from the letters already quoted, and especially from one to George Montagu written some time afterwards upon the occasion of a visit to the once familiar scenes. It is dated from the Christopher Inn, a famous old hostelry, well known to Eton boys:—“The Christopher. Lord!

how great I used to think anybody just landed at the Christopher! But here are no boys for me to send for — here I am, like Noah, just returned into his old world again, with all sorts of queer feels about me. By the way, the clock strikes the old cracked sound — I recollect so much and remember so little — and want to play about — and am so afraid of my play-fellows — and am ready to shirk Ashton — and can't help making fun of myself — and envy a dame over the way, that has just locked in her boarders, and is going to sit down in a little hot parlour to a very bad supper, so comfortably! and I could be so jolly a dog if I did not fat, which, by the way, is the first time the word was ever applicable to me. In short, I should be out of all bounds if I was to tell you half I feel, how young again I am one minute and how old the next. But do come and feel with me, when you will — to-morrow — adieu! If I don't compose myself a little more before Sunday morning, when Ashton is to preach [“Plato” at the date of this letter had already taken orders], I shall certainly be in a bill for laughing at church; but how to help it, to see him in the pulpit, when the last time I saw him here, was standing up fuming over against a conduit to be catechised.” *

This letter, of which the date is not given, but which Cunningham places after March, 1737, must have been written some time after he had taken up his residence at Cambridge in his father’s college of King’s. This he did in March, 1735, following an interval of residence in London. By this time the “quadruple alliance” had been broken up by the defection of West, who, much against his will, had gone to Christ Church, Oxford. Ashton (whom we have seen above an ordained clergyman) and Gray had however been a year at Cambridge, the latter as a fellow-commoner of Peterhouse, the former at Walpole’s own college, King’s. Cole and the Conways were also at Cambridge, so that much of the old intercourse must have been continued. Walpole’s record of his university studies is of the most scanty kind. He does little more than give us the names of his tutors, public and private. In civil law he attended the lectures of Dr. Dickens of Trinity Hall; in anatomy, those of Dr. Battie. French, he says, he had learnt at Eton. His Italian master at

* Walpole to Montagu, no date. Cunningham, 1857, i, 15.

Cambridge was Signor Piazza (who had at least an Italian name !), and his instructor in drawing was the miniaturist Bernard Lens, the teacher of the Duke of Cumberland and the Princesses Mary and Louisa. Lens was the author of a New and Complete Drawing Book for curious young Gentlemen and Ladies that study and practice the noble and commendable Art of Drawing, Colouring, etc., and is kindly referred to in the later Anecdotes of Painting. In mathematics, which Walpole seems to have hated as cordially as Swift and Goldsmith and Gray did, he sat at the feet of the blind Professor Nicholas Saunderson, author of the Elements of Algebra. Years afterwards (à propos of a misguided enthusiast who had put the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid into Latin verse) he tells one of his correspondents the result of these ministrations: “I . . . was always so incapable of learning mathematics, that I could not even get by heart the multiplication table, as blind Professor Saunderson honestly told me, above three-score years ago, when I went to his lectures at Cambridge. After the first fortnight he said to me, ‘Young man, it would be cheating you to take your money; for you can never learn what I am trying to teach you.' I was exceedingly mortified, and cried; for, being a Prime Minister's son, I had firmly believed all the flattery with which I had been assured that my parts were capable of anything. I paid a private instructor for a year; but, at the year's end, was forced to own Saunderson had been in the right."* This private instructor was in all probability Mr. Trevigar, who, Walpole says, read lectures to him in mathematics and philosophy. From other expressions in his letters, it must be inferred that his progress in the dead languages, if respectable, was not brilliant. He confesses, on one occasion, his inability to help Cole in a Latin epitaph, and he tells Pinkerton that he never was a good Greek scholar.

His correspondence at this period, chiefly addressed to West and George Montagu, is not extensive. But it is already characteristic. In one of his letters to Montagu he encloses a translation of a little French dialogue between a turtle-dove and a passer-by. The verses are of no particular merit, but in the comment one recognises a cast of style soon to be familiar. "You will excuse this gentle nothing, I mean

* Walpole to Miss Berry, 16 Aug., 1796.

mine, when I tell you I translated it out of pure good-nature for the use of a disconsolate wood-pigeon in our grove, that was made a widow by the barbarity of a gun. She coos and calls me so movingly, 'twould touch your heart to hear her, I protest to you it grieves me to pity her. She is so allicholly * as any thing. I'll warrant you now she's as sorry as one of us would be. Well, good man, he's gone and he died like a lamb. She's an unfortunate woman, but she must have patience."† In another letter to West, after expressing his astonishment that Gray should be at Burnham in Buckinghamshire, and yet be too indolent to revisit the old Eton haunts in his vicinity, he goes on to gird at the university curriculum. At Cambridge, he says, they are supposed to betake themselves "to some trade, as logic, philosophy, or mathematics." But he has been used to the delicate food of Parnassus, and can never condescend to the grosser studies of Alma Mater. "Sober cloth of syllogism colour suits me ill; or, what's worse, I hate clothes that one must prove to be of no colour at all. If the Muses cœlique vias et sidera monstrant, and quâ vi maria alta tumescant; why accipiant: but 'tis thrashing, to study philosophy in the abstruse authors. I am not against cultivating these studies, as they are certainly useful; but then they quite neglect all polite literature, all knowledge of this world. Indeed, such people have not much occasion for this latter; for they shut themselves up from it, and study till they know less than any one. Great mathematicians have been of great use; but the generality of them are quite unconversible: they frequent the stars, sub pedibusque vident nubes, but they can't see through them. I tell you what I see; that by living amongst them I write of nothing else: my letters are all parallelograms, two sides equal to two sides; and every paragraph an axiom, that tells you nothing but what every mortal almost knows."* In an earlier note he has been on a tour to Oxford, and, with a premonition of the future connoisseur of Strawberry Hill, criticises the gentlemen's seats on the road. "Coming back we saw Easton Neston [in Northamptonshire], a seat of Lord Pomfret, where in an old greenhouse is a wonderful fine statue of Tully, haranguing a numerous assembly of decayed emperors, vestal virgins with new noses, Colos-sus's, Venus's, headless carcases and carcaseless heads, pieces of tombs, and hieroglyphics."* A little later he has been to his father's seat at Houghton: "I am returned again to Cambridge, and can tell what I never expected, that I like Norfolk. Not any of the ingredients, as Hunting or Country Gentlemen, for I had nothing to do with them, but the county, which a little from Houghton is woody and full of delightful prospects. I went to see Norwich and Yarmouth, both of which I like exceedingly. I spent my time at Houghton for the first week almost alone; we have a charming Garden all Wilderness, much adapted to my Romantick inclinations." In after life the liking for Norfolk here indicated does not seem to have continued, especially when his father's death had withdrawn a part of its attractions. "He hated Norfolk"—says Mr. Cunningham. He did not care for Norfolk ale, Norfolk turnips, Norfolk dumplings, or Norfolk turkeys. Its flat, sandy, aguish scenery was not to his taste. He preferred "the rich blue prospects" of his mother's county, Kent.

* "Indeed, she is given too much to allicholly and musing" (Merry Wives of Windsor, act i, sc. iv).

† Walpole to Montagu, 30 May, 1736.

* Walpole to West, 17 Aug., 1736.

* Walpole to Montagu, 20 May, 1736.

Of literary effort while at Cambridge Walpole's record is not great. In 1736, he was one of the group of university poets — Gray and West being also of the number — who addressed congratulatory verses to Frederick, Prince of Wales, upon his marriage with the Princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha; and he wrote a poem (which is reprinted in Vol. i of his works) to the memory of the founder of King's College, Henry VI. This is dated 2 February, 1738. In the interim Lady Walpole died. Her son's references to his loss display the most genuine regret. In a letter to Charles Lyttleton (afterwards the well-known Dean of Exeter, and Bishop of Carlisle) which is not included in Cunningham's edition, and is apparently dated in error September, 1732, instead of 1737,* he dwells with much feeling on "the surprising calmness and courage which my dear Mother show'd before her death. I believe few women wou'd behave so well, and I am certain no man could behave better. For three or four days before she dyed, she spoke of it with less indifference than one speaks of a cold; and while she was sensible, which she was within her two last hours, she discovered no manner of apprehension." That his warm affection for her was well known to his friends may be inferred from a passage in one of Gray's letters to West:—"While I write to you, I hear the bad news of Lady Walpole's death on Saturday night last [20 Aug., 1737]. Forgive me if the thought of what my poor Horace must feel on that account obliges me to have done."* Lady Walpole was buried in Westminster Abbey, where, on her monument in Henry VIIth's Chapel, may be read the piously eulogistic inscription which her youngest son composed to her memory—an inscription not easy to reconcile in all its terms with the current estimate of her character. But in August, 1737, she was considerably over fifty, and had probably long outlived the scandals of which she had been the subject in the days when Kneller and Eckardt painted her as a young and beautiful woman.

* Notes and Queries, 2 January, 1869.

* Gray's Works by Gosse, 1884, ii, 9.

E PERRY-MORAN

CHAPTER II.

Patent places under Government ; starts with Gray on the Grand Tour, March, 1739 ; from Dover to Paris ; life at Paris ; Versailles ; the Convent of the Chartreux ; life at Rheims ; a fête galante ; the Grande Chartreuse ; starts for Italy ; the episode of Tory ; Turin, Genoa, academical exercises at Bologna ; life at Florence ; Rome, Naples, Herculaneum ; the pen of Radicofani ; English at Florence ; Lady Mary Wortley Montagu ; preparing for home ; quarrel with Gray ; Walpole's apologia ; his illness, and return to England.

II.

THAT, in those piping days of patronage, when even very young ladies of quality drew pay as cornets of horse, the son of the Prime Minister of England should be left unprovided for, was not to be expected. While he was still resident at Cambridge, lucrative sinecures came to Horace Walpole. Soon after his mother's death, his father appointed him Inspector of Imports and Exports in the Custom House, a post which he resigned in January,

1738, on succeeding Colonel William Townshend as Usher of the Exchequer. When, later in the year, he came of age (17 September), he "took possession of two other little patent places in the Exchequer, called Comptroller of the Pipe, and Clerk of the Estreats," which had been held for him by a substitute. In 1782, when he still filled them, the two last-mentioned offices produced together about £300 per annum, while the Ushership of the Exchequer, at the date of his obtaining it, was reckoned to be worth £900 a year. "From that time (he says) I lived on my own income, and travelled at my own expense; nor did I during my father's life receive from him but £250 at different times; which I say, not in derogation of his extreme tenderness and goodness to me, but to show that I was content with what he had given to me, and that from the age of twenty I was no charge to my family." *

He continued at King's College for some time after he had attained his majority, only quitting it formally in March, 1739, not without regretful memories of which his future correspondence was to bear the traces. If he had neglected mathematics, and only moderately courted the classics, he had learnt something of the polite arts and of modern continental letters—studies which would naturally lead his inclination in the direction of the inevitable “grand tour.” Two years earlier he had very unwillingly declined an invitation from George Montagu and Lord Conway to join them in a visit to Italy. Since that date his desire for foreign travel, fostered no doubt by long conversations with Gray, had grown stronger, and he resolved to see “the palms and temples of the south” after the orthodox eighteenth-century fashion. To think of Gray in this connection was but natural, and he accordingly invited his friend (who had now quitted Cambridge, and was vegetating rather disconsolately in his father’s house on Cornhill) to be his travelling companion. Walpole was to act as paymaster; but Gray was to be independent. Furthermore Walpole made a will under which, if he died abroad, Gray was to be his sole legatee. Dispositions so advantageous and considerate scarcely admitted of refusal, even if Gray had been backward, which he was not. The two friends accordingly set out for Paris. Walpole makes the date of departure

* Account of my Conduct, etc. Works, 1798, ii, 363-70.

10 March, 1739; Gray says they left Dover at twelve on the 29th.

The first records of the journey come from Amiens in a letter written by Gray to his mother. After a rough passage across the Straits, they reached Calais at five. Next day they started for Boulogne in the then new-fangled invention, a post-chaise—a vehicle which Gray describes “as of much greater use than beauty, resembling an ill-shaped chariot, only with the door opening before instead of [at] the side.” Of Boulogne they see little, and of Montreuil (where later Sterne engaged La Fleur) Gray’s only record, besides the indifferent fare, is that “Madame the hostess made her appearance in long lappets of bone lace, and a sack of linsey-woolsey.” From Montreuil they go by Abbeville to Amiens, where they visit the cathedral, and the chapels of the Jesuits and Ursuline Nuns. But the best part of this first letter is the little vignette with which it (or rather as much of it as Mason published) concludes. “The country we have passed through hitherto has been flat, open, but agreeably diversified with villages, fields well-cultivated, and little rivers. On every hillock is a wind-mill, a crucifix, or a Virgin Mary dressed in flowers, and a sarcenet robe: one sees not many people or carriages on the road; now and then indeed you meet a strolling friar, a countryman with his great muff, or a woman riding astride on a little ass, with short petticoats, and a great head-dress of blue wool."*

The foregoing letter is dated the 1st April, and it speaks of reaching Paris on the 3rd. But it was only on the evening of Saturday the 9th that they rolled into the French capital "driving through the streets a long while before they knew where they were." Walpole had wisely resolved not to hurry, and they had besides broken down at Luzarches, and lingered at St. Denis over the curiosities of the abbey, particularly an onyx vase carved with Bacchus and the nymphs, of which they had dreamed ever since. At Paris they found a warm welcome among the English residents—notably from Mason's patron, Lord Holderness, and Walpole's cousins, the Conways. They seem to have plunged at once into the pleasures of the place, pleasures in which, according to Walpole, cards and eating played far too absorbing a part. At Lord Holderness's they met at supper the famous author of Manon Lescaut, M. l'Abbé Antoine François Prévost d'Exiles, who had just put forth the final volume of his tedious and scandalous Histoire de M. Cléveland. They went to the spectacle of Pandore at the Salle des Machines of the Tuileries; and they went to the opera, where they saw the successful Ballet de la Paix, a curious hotch-pot, from Gray's description, of cracked voices and incongruous mythology. With the Comédie Française they were better pleased, although Walpole, strange to say, unlike Goldsmith ten years later, was not able to commend the performance of Molière's L'Avare. They saw Mademoiselle Gaussin (as yet unrivalled by the unrisen Mademoiselle Clairon) in La Noue's tragedy of Mahomet Second, then recently produced, with Dufresne in the leading male part; and they also saw the prince of petits-maitres, Grandval, acting with Dufresne's sister, Mademoiselle Jeanne-Françoise Quinault (an actress "somewhat in Mrs. Clive's way," says Gray), in the Philosophe Marié of Nericault Destouches, a charming comedy already transferred to the English stage in the version by John Kelly of The Universal Spectator.

* Gray's Works, by Gosse, 1884, ii, 18-19.

Theatres, however, are not the only amusements which the two travellers chronicle to the home-keeping West. A great part of their time is spent in seeing churches and palaces full of pictures. Then there is the inevitable visit to Versailles which, in sum, they concur in condemning. “The great front,” says Walpole, “is a lumber of littleness, composed of black brick, stuck full of bad old busts, and fringed with gold rails.” Gray (he says) likes it; but Gray is scarcely more complimentary,—at all events is quite as hard upon the façade, using almost the same phrases of depreciation. It is “a huge heap of littleness,” in hue “black, dirty red, and yellow; the first proceeding from stone changed by age; the second from a mixture of brick; and the last from a profusion of tarnished gilding. You cannot see a more disagreeable tout ensemble; and, to finish the matter, it is all stuck over in many places with small busts of a tawny hue between every two windows.” The garden, however, pleases him better; nothing could be vaster and more magnificent than the coup d’œil with its fountains and statues and grand canal. But the “general taste of the place” is petty and artificial—“all is forced, all is constrained about you; statues and vases sowed everywhere without distinction; sugar loaves and minced pies of yew; scrawl work of box, and little squirming jets d'eau, besides a great sameness in the walks, cannot help striking one at first sight, not to mention the silliest of labyrinths, and all Æsop's fables in water.* “The garden is littered with statues and fountains, each of which has its tutelary deity. In particular, the elementary god of fire solaces himself in one. In another, Enceladus, in lieu of a mountain, is overwhelmed with many waters. There are avenues of water pots, who disport themselves in squirming up cascadelins. In short, 'tis a garden for a great child.”† The day following, being Whitsunday, they witness a grand ceremonial—the installation of nine Knights of the Saint Esprit—“high mass celebrated with music, great crowd, much incense, King, Queen, Dauphin, Mesdames, Cardinals, and Court: Knights arrayed by His Majesty; reverences before the altar, not bows but curtsies; stiff hams: much tittering among the ladies; trumpets, kettle-drums, and fifes.”‡

* Gray to West, 22 May, 1739. † Walpole to West, no date, 1739.

‡ Gray to West, 22 May, 1739.

It is Gray who thus summarises the show. But we must go to Walpole for the account of another expedition, the visit to the Convent of the Chartreux, the uncouth horror of which, with its gloomy chapel and narrow cloisters, seems to have fascinated the Gothic soul of the future author of the Castle of Otranto. Here, in one of the cells, they make the acquaintance of a fresh initiate into the order—the account of whose surroundings suggests rather retirement than solitude. “He was extremely civil, and called himself Dom Victor. We have promised to visit him often. Their habit is all white: but besides this he was infinitely clean in his person; and his apartment and garden, which he keeps and cultivates without any assistance, was neat to a degree. He has four little rooms, furnished in the prettiest manner, and hung with good prints. One of them is a library, and another a gallery. He has several canary-birds disposed in a pretty manner in breeding cages. In his garden was a bed of good tulips in bloom, flowers and fruit-trees, and all neatly kept. They are permitted at certain hours to talk to strangers, but never to one another, or to go out of their convent.” In the same institution they saw Le Sueur's history (in pictures) of St. Bruno, the founder of the Chartreux. Walpole had not yet studied Raphael at Rome, but these pictures, he considered, excelled everything he had seen in England and Paris.*

"From thence [Paris]," say Walpole's Short Notes, "we went with my cousin Henry Conway, to Rheims, in Champagne, [and] staid there three months." One of their chief objects was to improve themselves in French. "You must not wonder," he tells West, "if all my letters resemble dictionaries, with French on one side and English on t'other; I deal in nothing else at present, and talk a couple of words of each language alternately from morning till night."† But he does not seem to have yet developed his later passion for letter-writing, and the "account of our situation and proceedings" is still delegated to Gray, some of whose despatches at this time are not preserved. There is, however, one from Rheims to Gray's mother which gives a vivid idea of the ancient French Cathedral city, slumbering in its vast vine-clad plain, with its picturesque old houses and lonely streets, its long walks under the ramparts, and its monotonous frog-haunted moat. They have no want of society, for Henry Conway procured them introductions everywhere; but the Rhemois are more constrained, less familiar, less hospitable than the Parisians. Quadrille is the almost invariable amusement, interrupted by one entertainment (for the Rhemois as a rule give neither dinners nor suppers), to wit, a five o'clock gouter, which is “a service of wine, fruits, cream, sweet-meats, crawfish, and cheese,” after which they sit down to cards again. Occasionally, however, the demon of impromptu flutters these “set, gray lives,” and (like Dr. Johnson) even Rheims must “have a frisk.” “For instance,” says Gray, “the other evening we happened to be got together in a company of eighteen people, men and women of the best fashion here, at a garden in the town to walk; when one of the ladies bethought herself of asking, Why should we not sup here? Immediately the cloth was laid by the side of a fountain under the trees, and a very elegant supper served up; after which another said, Come, let us sing; and directly began herself. From singing we insensibly fell to dancing, and singing in a round; when somebody mentioned the violins and immediately a company of them was ordered. Minuets were begun in the open air, and then came country dances, which held till four o'clock next morning; at which hour the gayest lady there proposed, that such as were weary should get into their coaches, and the rest of them should dance before them with the music in the van; and in this manner we paraded through all the principal streets of the city, and waked everybody in it." Walpole, adds Gray, would have made this entertainment chronic. But "the women did not come into it," and shrank back decorously "to their dull cards, and usual formalities."*

* Walpole to West, no date, 1739. † Walpole to West, 18 June, 1739.

At Rheims the travellers lingered on in the hope of being joined by Selwyn and George Montagu. In September they left Rheims for Dijon, the superior attractions of which town made them rather regret their comparative rustication of the last three months. From Dijon they passed southward to Lyons, whence Gray sent to West (then drinking the Tunbridge waters) a daintily elaborated conceit touching the junction of the Rhone and the Saône. While at Lyons they made an excursion to Geneva to escort Henry Conway, who had up to this time been their companion, on his way to that place. They took a roundabout route in order to visit the Convent of the Grand Chartreuse, and on the 28th Walpole writes to West from "a Hamlet among the mountains of Savoy [Echelles]." He is to undergo many transmigrations, he says, before he ends his letter. "Yesterday I was a shepherd of Dauphiné; to-day an Alpine savage; to-morrow a Carthusian monk; and Friday a Swiss Calvinist." When he next takes up his pen, he has passed through his third stage, and visited the Chartreuse. With the convent itself neither Gray nor his companions seem to have been much impressed, probably because their expectations had been indefinite. For the approach and the situation they had only enthusiasm. Gray is the accredited landscape-painter of the party, but here even Walpole breaks out: "The road, West, the road! winding round a prodigious mountain, and surrounded with others, all shagged with hanging woods, obscured with pines, or lost in clouds! Below, a torrent breaking through cliffs, and tumbling through fragments of rocks! Sheets of cascades forcing their silver speed down channelled precipices, and hastening into the roughened river at the bottom! Now and then an old foot bridge, with a broken rail, a leaning cross, a cottage, or the ruin of an hermitage! This sounds too bombast and too romantic to one that has not seen it, too cold for one that has. If I could send you my letter post between two lovely tempests that echoed each other's wrath, you might have some idea of this noble roaring scene, as you were reading it. Almost on the summit, upon a fine verdure, but without any prospect, stands the Chartreuse." *

* Gray's Works, by Gosse, 1884, ii, 30.

The foregoing passage is dated Aix-in-Savoy, 30 September. Two days later, passing by Annecy, they came to Geneva. Here they stayed a week to see Conway settled, and made a "solitary journey" back to Lyons, but by a different road, through the spurs of the Jura and across the plains of La Bresse. At Lyons they found letters awaiting them from Sir Robert Walpole, desiring his son to go to Italy, a proposal with which Gray, only too glad to exchange the over-commercial city of Lyons for

* Walpole to West, 28 Sept.—2 Oct., 1739.

“the place in the world that best deserves seeing,” was highly delighted. Accordingly we speedily find them duly equipped with “beaver bonnets, beaver gloves, beaver stockings, muffs, and bearskins” en route for the Alps. At the foot of Mont Cenis their chaise was taken to pieces and loaded on mules, and they themselves were transferred to low matted legless chairs carried on poles—a not unperilous mode of progression, when, as in this case, quarrels took place among the bearers. But the tragedy of the journey happened before they had quitted the chaise. Walpole had a fat little black spaniel of King Charles’s breed, named Tory, and he had let the little creature out of the carriage for the air. While it was waddling along contentedly at the horses’ heads, a gaunt wolf rushed out of a fir wood, and exit poor Tory before any one had time to snap a pistol. In later years, Gray would perhaps have celebrated this mishap as elegantly as he sang the death of his friend’s favourite cat, but in these pre-poetic days, he restricts himself to calling it an “odd accident enough.” *

* Tory, however, was not illachrymabilis. He found his vates sacer in one Edward Burnaby

Greene, once of Bennet College; and in referring to this, thirty-five years later, Walpole explains

"After eight days' journey through Green-land,"—as Gray puts it to West,—they reached Turin, where among other English, they found Pope's friend, Joseph Spence, Professor of Poetry at Oxford. Beyond Walpole's going to Court, and their visiting an extraordinary play called La Rappresentazione dell'Anima Dam-nata (for the benefit of an Hospital), a full and particular account of which is contained in one of Spence's letters to his mother,* nothing remarkable seems to have happened to them in the Piedmontese capital. From Turin they went on to Genoa,—“the happy country where huge lemons grow” (as Gray quotes, not textually, from Waller),—whose blue sea and vine-trellises they quit reluctantly for Bologna, by way of Tortona, Piacenza, Parma (where they inspect the Correggios in the Duomo), Reggio, and Modena. At Bologna, in the absence of introductions, picture-seeing is their main occupation. “Except pictures and statues,” writes Walpole, “we are not very fond of sights.” . . .

how Tory got his name. “His god-mother was the widow of Alderman Parsons [Humphrey Parsons of Goldsmith's “black champagne”], who gave him at Paris to Lord Conway, and he to me” (Walpole to Cole, 10 Dec., 1775).

* Spence's Anecdotes, by Singer, 2nd edn., 1858, pp. 305–8.

“Now and then we drop in at a procession, or a high-mass, hear the music, enjoy a strange attire, and hate the foul monkhood. Last week was the feast of the Immaculate Conception. On the eve we went to the Franciscans’ church to hear the academical exercises. There were moult and moult clergy, about two dozen dames, that treated one another with illustriSSima and brown kisses, the vice-legate, the gonfalonier, and some senate. The vice-legate . . . is a young personable person, of about twenty, and had on a mighty pretty cardinal-kind of habit; ‘twou’d make a delightful masquerade dress. We asked his name: Spinola. What, a nephew of the cardinal-legate? Signor, no: ma credo che gli sia qualche cosa. He sat on the right-hand with the gonfalonier in two purple fauteuils. Opposite was a throne of crimson damask with the device of the Academy, the Gelati,* and trimmings of gold. Here sat at a

* “Jarchius has taken the trouble to give us a list of those clubs, or academies [i. e., the academies of Italy], which amount to five hundred and fifty, each distinguished by somewhat whimsical in the name. The academies of Bologna, for instance, are divided into the Abbandonati, the Ausiosi, Ociosi, Arcadi, Confusi, Dubbiosi, etc. There are few of these who have not published their transactions, and scarce a member who is not looked upon as the most famous man in the world, at home” (Goldsmith, in The Bee, No. vi, for 10 November, 1759).

table, in black, the head of the Academy, between the orator and the first poet. At two semi-circular tables on either hand sat three poets and three; silent among many candles. The chief made a little introduction, the orator a long Italian vile harangue. Then the chief, the poet, the poets,—who were a Franciscan, an Olivetan, an old abbé, and three lay,—read their compositions; and to-day they are pasted up in all parts of the town. As we came out of the church, we found all the convent and neighbouring houses lighted all over with lanthorns of red and yellow paper, and two bonfires.” *

In the Christmas of 1739, the friends crossed the Apennines, and entered Florence. If they had wanted introductions at Bologna, there was no lack of them in Tuscany, and they were to find one friend who afterwards figured largely in Walpole’s correspondence. This was Mr. (afterwards Sir Horace) Mann, British Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Florence. “He is the best and most obliging person in the world,” says Gray, and his house, with a brief interval, was their residence for fifteen months. Their letters from Florence are less interesting than those from which quotations have already been made, while their amusements seem to have been more independent of each other than before. Gray occupied himself in the galleries taking the notes of pictures and statuary afterwards published by Mitford, and in forming a collection of MS. music: Walpole, on the other hand, had slightly cooled in his eagerness for the antique, which now "pleases him calmly." "I recollect"—he says, "the joy I used to propose if I could but once see the Great Duke's gallery; I walk into it now with as little emotion as I should into St. Paul's. The statues are a congregation of good sort of people, that I have a great deal of unruffled regard for." The fact was, no doubt, that society had now superior attractions. As the son of the English Prime Minister, and with Mann, who was a relation, at his elbow, all doors were open to him. A correct record of his time would probably show an unvaried succession of suppers, balls, and masquerades. In the carnival week, when he snatches "a little unmasqued moment" to write to West, he says he has done nothing lately "but slip out of his domino into bed, and out of bed into his domino. The end of the Carnival is frantic, bacchanalian; all the morn one makes parties in masque to the shops and coffee-houses, and all the evening to the operas and balls." If Gray was of these junketings, his letters do not betray it. He was probably engaged in writing uncomplimentary notes on the Venus de' Medici, or transcribing a score of Pergolesi.

* Walpole to West, no date, 1739.

The first interruption to these diversions came in March, when they quitted Florence for Rome in order to witness the coronation of the successor of Clement XII, who had died in the preceding month. On their road from Siena they were passed by a shrill-voiced figure in a red cloak with a white handkerchief on its head which they took for a fat old woman, but which afterwards turned out to be Farinelli's rival, Senesino. Rome disappointed them—especially in its inhabitants and general desolation. "I am very glad"—writes Walpole—"that I see it while it yet exists"; and he goes on to prophesy that before a great number of years it will cease to exist. "I am persuaded," he says again, "that in a hundred years Rome will not be worth seeing; 'tis less so now than one would believe. All the public pictures are decayed or decaying; the few ruins cannot last long, and the statues and private collections must be sold from the great poverty of the families." Perhaps this last consideration, coupled with the depressing character of Roman hospitality ("Roman conversations are dreadful things"!—he tells Conway), revived his virtuoso tastes. "I am far gone in medals, lamps, idols, prints, etc., and all the small commodities to the purchase of which I can attain; I would buy the Coliseum if I could." Meanwhile, as the cardinals are quarrelling, the coronation is still deferred; and they visit Naples, whence they explore Herculaneum, then but recently exposed and identified. But neither Gray nor Walpole waxes very eloquent upon this theme, probably because at this time the excavations were only partial, while Pompeii was, of course, as yet under ground. Walpole's next letter is written from Radicofani—"a vile little town at the foot of an old citadel"—which again is at "the top of a black barren mountain"—the whole reminding the writer of "Hamilton's Bawn" in Swift's verses. In this place, although the traditional residence of one of the Three Kings of Cologne, there is but one pen, the property of the Governor, who when Walpole borrows it, sends it to him under "conduct of a sergeant and two Swiss" with special injunctions as to its restoration, a precaution which in Walpole's view renders it worthy to be ranked with the other precious relics of the poor Capuchins of the place, concerning which he presently makes rather unkindly fun. A few days later they were once more in the Casa Ambrosio, Mann's pleasant house at Florence, with the river running so close to them that they could fish out of the windows. "I have a terreno all to myself,"—says Walpole,—“with an open gallery on the Arno where I am now writing to you [i. e., Conway]. Over against me is the famous Gallery; and, on either hand, two fair bridges. Is not this charming and cool?” Add to which, on the bridges aforesaid, in the serene Italian air, one may linger all night in a dressing-gown, eating iced fruits to the notes of a guitar. But (what was even better than music and moonlight) there is the society that was the writer's “fitting environment.” Lady Pomfret, with her daughters, Lady Charlotte, afterwards governess to the children of George III, and the beauty Lady

Sophia, held a "charming conversation" once a week; while the Princess Craon de Beauvau has "a constant pharaoh and supper every night, where one is quite at one's ease." Another lady-resident, scarcely so congenial to Walpole, was his sister-in-law, the wife of his eldest brother, Robert, who with Lady Pomfret made certain (in Walpole's eyes) wholly preposterous pretensions to the yet uninvented status of blue-stockings. To Lady Walpole and Lady Pomfret was speedily added another "she-meteor" in the person of the celebrated Lady Mary Wortley Montagu.

When Lady Mary arrived in Florence in the summer of 1740, she was a woman of more than fifty, and was just entering upon that unexplained exile from her country and husband which was prolonged for two and twenty years. Her brilliant abilities were unimpaired; but it is probable that the personal eccentricities which had exposed her to the satire of Pope, had not decreased with years. That these would be extenuated under Walpole's malicious pen was not to be expected; still less, perhaps, that they would be treated justly. Although, as already intimated, he was not aware of the scandal respecting himself which her descendants were to revive, he had ample ground for antipathy. Her husband was the bitter foe of Sir Robert Walpole; and she herself had been the firm friend and protectress of his mother's rival and successor, Miss Skerret.* Accordingly, even before her advent, he makes merry over the anticipated issue of this portentous "triple alliance" of mysticism and nonsense, and later he writes to Conway.—"Did I tell you Lady Mary Wortley is here? She laughs at my Lady Walpole, scolds my Lady Pomfret, and is laughed at by the whole town. Her dress, her avarice, and her impudence must amaze any one that never heard her name. She wears a foul mob, that does not cover her greasy black locks, that hang loose, never combed or curled; an old mazarine blue wrapper that gapes open and discovers a canvass petticoat. . . . In three words I will give you her picture as we drew it in the Sortes Virgilianæ,—Insanam vatem aspicies. I give you my honour we did not choose it; but Gray, Mr. Coke, Sir Francis

* Shortly after Lady Walpole's death, Sir Robert Walpole married his mistress, Maria Skerret, who died 4 June, 1738, leaving a daughter, Horace Walpole's half sister, subsequently Lady Mary Churchill.

Dashwood, and I, with several others drew it fairly amongst a thousand for different people." * In justice to Lady Mary it is only fair to say that she seems to have been quite unconscious that she was an object of ridicule, and was perfectly satisfied with her reception at Florence. "Lord and Lady Pomfret"—she tells Mr. Wortley—"take pains to make the place agreeable to me, and I have been visited by the greatest part of the people of quality." † But although Walpole's portrait is obviously splendid (some of its details are suppressed in the above quotation), it is plain that even moderate spectators could not deny her peculiarities. "Lady Mary"—said Spence—"is one of the most shining characters in the world, but shines like a comet; she is all irregularity, and always wandering; the most wise, the most imprudent; loveliest, most disagreeable; best-natured, cruellest woman in the world: 'all things by turns but nothing long.'" ‡

By this time the new pope, Benedict XIV, had been elected. But although the friends were within four days' journey of Rome, the fear of heat and malaria forced them to forego the spectacle of the coronation. They continued to reside with Mann at Florence until May in the following year. Upon Gray the “violent delights” of the Tuscan capital had already begun to pall. It is—he says—“an excellent place to employ all one’s animal sensations in, but utterly contrary to one’s rational powers.” Walpole, on the other hand, is in his element. “I am so well within and without,” he says in the same letter which sketches Lady Mary, “that you would scarce know me: I am younger than ever, think of nothing but diverting myself, and live in a round of pleasures. We have operas, concerts, and balls, mornings and evenings. I dare not tell you all of one’s idlenesses, you would look so grave and senatorial, at hearing that one rises at eleven in the morning, goes to the opera at nine at night, to supper at one, and to bed at three! But literally here the evenings and nights are so charming and so warm, one can’t avoid ‘em.” In a later letter he says he has lost all curiosity and “except the towns in the straight road to Great Britain, shall scarce see a jot more of a foreign land.” Save and except a sally about the humours of “Moll Worthless” (Lady Mary) and Lady Walpole, and the record of the purchase of a few pictures, medals, and busts—one of the last of which, a Vespaſian in basalt, was subsequently among the glories of the Twickenham Gallery — his remaining letters from Florence contain little of interest. Early in 1741, the homeward journey was mapped out. They were to go to Bologna to hear the Viscontina sing; they were to visit the Fair at Reggio, and so by Venice homewards.

* Walpole to Conway, 25 September, 1740.

† Letters, etc., of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, ii, 325.

‡ Spence's Anecdotes, by Singer, 2nd edn., 1858, p. xxiii.

But whether the Viscontina was in voice or not, there is, as far as our travellers are concerned, absence of evidence. No farther letter of Gray from Florence has been preserved, nor is there any mention of him in Walpole’s next despatch to West from Reggio. At that place a misunderstanding seems to have arisen, and they parted, Gray going forward to Venice with two other travelling companions, Mr. John Chute and Mr. Whitehed. In the rather barren record of Walpole’s story, this misunderstanding naturally assumes an exaggerated importance. But it was really a very trifling and a very intelligible affair. They had been too long together; and the first fascination of travel, which formed at the outset so close a bond, had gradually faded with time. As this alteration took place, their natural dispositions began to assert themselves, and Walpole's normal love of pleasure and Gray's retired studiousness became more and more apparent. It is probable too, that, in all the Florentine gaieties, Gray, who was not a great man's son, fell a little into the background. At all events the separation was imminent, and it needed but a nothing—the alleged opening by Walpole of a letter to Gray—to bring it about. Whatever the proximate cause, both were silent on the subject, although, years after the quarrel had been made up, and Gray was dead, Walpole took the entire blame upon himself. When Mason was preparing Gray's Memoirs in 1773, he authorised him to insert a note by which, in general terms, he admitted himself to have been in fault, assigning as his reason for not being more explicit, that while he was living it would not be pleasant to read his private quarrels discussed in magazines and newspapers. But to Mason personally he was at the same time thoroughly candid, as well as considerate to his departed friend:—“I am conscious,” he says, “that in the beginning of the differences between Gray and me, the fault was mine. I was too young, too fond of my own diversions, nay, I do not doubt, too much intoxicated by indulgence, vanity, and the insolence of my situation, as a Prime Minister's son, not to have been inattentive and insensible to the feelings of one I thought below me; of one, I blush to say it, that I knew was obliged to me; of one whom presumption and folly perhaps made me deem not my superior then in parts, though I have since felt my infinite inferiority to him. I treated him insolently: he loved me and I did not think he did. I reproached him with the difference between us when he acted from conviction of knowing he was my superior; I often disregarded his wishes of seeing places, which I would not quit other amusements to visit, though I offered to send him to them without me. Forgive me, if I say that his temper was not conciliating. At the same time that I will confess to you that he acted a more friendly part, had I had the sense to take advantage of it; he freely told me of my faults. I declared I did not desire to hear them, nor would correct them. You will not wonder that with the dignity of his spirit, and the obstinate carelessness of mine, the breach must have grown wider till we became incompatible.” *

“Sir, you have said more than was necessary”—was Johnson’s reply to a conciliatory speech from Topham Beauclerk. It is needless to comment further upon this incident, except to say that Walpole’s generous words show that the disagreement was rather the outcome of a sequence of long-strained circumstances than the result of momentary petulance. For a time reconciliation was deferred, but in the year 1744 it was effected by a lady, and the intimacy thus renewed continued for the remainder of Gray’s life.

Shortly after Gray’s departure in May, Walpole fell ill of a quinsy. He did not, at first, recognise the gravity of his ailment, and doctored himself. By a fortunate chance, Joseph Spence, then travelling as governor to the Earl of Lincoln, was in the neighbourhood, and responding

* Walpole to Mason, 2 March, 1773. The letters to Mason were first printed in 1851 by Mitford. But Pinkerton, in the Walpoliana, i, 95, had reported much the same thing. “The quarrel between Gray and me [Walpole] arose from his being too serious a companion. I had just broke loose from the restraints of the university, with as much money as I could spend, and I was willing to indulge myself. Gray was for antiquities, &c., while I was for perpetual balls and plays. The fault was mine.”

to a message from Walpole, “found him scarce able to speak.” Spence immediately sent for medical aid, and summoned from Florence one Antonio Cocchi, a physician and author of some eminence. Under Cocchi’s advice, Walpole speedily showed signs of improvement, though, in his own words in the Short Notes, he “was given over for five hours, escaping with great difficulty.” The sequel may be told from the same source. “I went to Venice with Henry Clinton, Earl of Lincoln, and Mr. Joseph Spence, Professor of Poetry, and after a month’s stay there, returned with them by sea from Genoa, landing at Antibes, and by the way of Toulon, Marseilles, Aix, and through Langue-doc to Montpellier, Toulouse, and Orleans, arrived at Paris, where I left the Earl and Mr. Spence, and landed at Dover, September 12th, 1741, O. S., having been chosen Member of Parliament for Kellington [Callington], in Cornwall, at the preceding General Election [of June], which Parliament put a period to my father’s administration, which had continued above twenty years.”

CHAPTER III.

Gains of the Grand Tour ; “Epistle to Ashton” ; resignation of Sir Robert Walpole, who becomes Earl of Orford ; collapse of the Secret Committee ; life at Houghton ; the picture gallery ; “A Sermon on Painting” ; Lord Orford as Moses ; the “Ædes Walpolianæ” ; Prior’s “Protogenes and Apelles” ; minor literature ; Lord Orford’s decline and death ; his panegyric ; Horace Walpole’s means.

III.

ALTHOUGH, during his residence in Italy, Walpole had neglected to accumulate the store of erudition which his friend Gray had been so industriously hiving for home consumption, he can scarcely be said to have learned nothing, especially at an age when much is learned unconsciously. His epistolary style, which, with its peculiar graces and pseudo-graces, had been already formed before he left England, had now acquired a fresh vivacity from his increased familiarity with the French and Italian languages; and he had carried on, however discursively, something more than a mere flirtation with antiquities. Dr. Conyers Middleton, whose once famous Life of Cicero was published early in 1741, and who was himself an antiquary of distinction, thought highly of Walpole's attainments in this way,* and indeed more than one passage in a poem written by Walpole to Ashton at this time could scarcely have been penned by any one not fairly familiar with (for example) the science of those "medals" upon which Mr. Addison had discoursed so learnedly after his Italian tour:—

"What scanty precepts! Studies how confined!
 Too mean to fill your comprehensive mind; Unsatisfy'd with knowing when or where Some Roman bigot rais'd a fane to FEAR;
 On what green medal VIRTUE stands express'd,
 How CONCORD's pictur'd, LIBERTY how dress'd;
 Or with wise ken judiciously define,
 When PIUS marks the honorary coin
 Of CARACALLA, or of ANTONINE." †

* " Juvenis, non tam generis nobilitate, ac paterni hominis gloriâ, quam ingenii, doctrinâ, et virtute propriâ illustris. Ille vero haud citius fere in patriam reversus est, quam de studiis meis, ut consuerat, familiariter per literas quærens, mihi ultro de copia sua, quicquid ad argumenti mei rationem, aut libelli ornamentum pertineret, pro arbitrio meo utendum obtulit."

Pref. ad Germana quædam Antiq. Monumenta, &c., p. 6 (Quoted in Mitford's Corr. of Walpole and Mason, 1851, i, x-xi).

† Walpole's Works, 1798, i, 6.

The poem from which these lines are taken — An Epistle from Florence to Thomas Ashton, Esq.; Tutor to the Earl of Plymouth — extends to some four hundred lines, and exhibits another side of Walpole's activity in Italy. “ You have seen ”— says Gray to West in July, 1740 — “ an Epistle to Mr. Ashton, that seems to me full of spirit and thought, and a good deal of poetic fire.” Writing to him ten years later, Gray seems still to have retained his first impression. “ Satire ”— he says — “ will be heard, for all the audience are by nature her friends; especially when she appears in the spirit of Dryden, with his strength, and often with his versification, such as you have caught in those lines on the Royal Unction, on the Papal Dominion, and Convents of both Sexes; on Henry VIII and Charles II, for these are to me the shining parts of your Epistle. There are many lines I could wish corrected, and some blotted out, but beauties enough to atone for a thousand worse faults than these.”* Walpole has never been ranked among the poets; but Gray's praise, in which Middleton and others concurred, justifies a further quotation. This is the passage on the Royal Unction and the Papal Dominion:—

* Gray's Works by Gosse, 1884, ii, 221.

“ When at the altar a new monarch kneels
 What conjur’d awe upon the people steals!
 The chosen HE adores the precious oil, Meekly receives the solemn charm, and while
 The priest some blessed nothings mutters o’er, Sucks in the sacred grease at every pore:
 He seems at once to shed his mortal skin,
 And feels divinity transfus’d within.
 The trembling vulgar dread the royal nod,
 And worship God’s anointed more than God.

“ Such sanction gives the prelate to such kings!
 So mischief from those hallow’d fountains springs.
 But bend your eye to yonder harass’d plains,
 Where king and priest in one united reigns;
 See fair Italia mourn her holy state,
 And droop oppress’d beneath a papal weight:
 Where fat celibacy usurps the soil,
 And sacred sloth consumes the peasant’s toil:
 The holy drones monopolise the sky,
 And plunder by a vow of poverty.
 The Christian cause their lewd profession taints, Unlearn’d, unchaste, uncharitable saints.”*

That the refined and fastidious Horace Walpole of later years should have begun as a passable imitator of Dryden is sufficiently piquant. But that the son of the great courtier Prime Minister should have distinguished himself by the vigour of his denunciations of kings and priests, especially when, as his biographers have not failed to remark, he was writing to one about to take orders, is more noticeable still. The poem was reprinted in his works, but he makes no mention of it in the Short Notes, nor of an Inscription for the Neglected Column in the Place of St. Mark at Florence, written at the same time and characterised by the same anti-monarchical spirit.

* Walpole’s Works, 1798, i, 8-9.

His letters to Mann, his chief correspondent at this date, are greatly occupied, during the next few months, with the climax of the catastrophe recorded at the end of the preceding chapter—the resignation of Sir Robert Walpole. The first of the long series was written on his way home in September, 1741, when he had for fellow-passengers the Viscontina, Amorevoli, and other Italian singers, then engaged in invading England. He appears to have at once taken up his residence with his father in Downing Street. Into the network of circumstances which had conspired to array against the great peace Minister the formidable opposition of disaffected Whigs, Jacobites, Tories, and adherents of the Prince of Wales, it would here be impossible to enter. But there were already signs that Sir Robert was nodding to his fall; and that although the old courage was as high as ever, the old buoyancy was beginning to flag. Failing health added its weight to the scale. In October Walpole tells his correspondent that he had “been very near sealing his letter with black wax,” for his father had been in danger of his life, but was recovering, though he is no longer the Sir Robert that Mann once knew. He who once would snore before they had drawn his curtains, now never slept above an hour without waking; and “he who at dinner always forgot that he was Minister,” now sat silent with eyes fixed for an hour together. At the opening of Parliament, however, there was an ostensible majority of forty for the Court, and Walpole seems to have regarded this as encouraging. But one of the first motions was for an enquiry into the state of the nation, and this was followed by a division upon a Cornish petition which reduced the majority to seven,—a variation which sets the writer nervously jesting about apartments in the Tower. Seven days later the opposition obtained a majority of four, and although Sir Robert, still sanguine in the remembrance of past successes, seemed less anxious than his family, matters were growing grave, and his youngest son was reconciling himself to the coming blow. It came practically on the 21st January, 1742, when Pulteney moved for a secret committee, which (in reality) was to be a committee of accusation against the Prime Minister. Walpole defeated this manœuvre with his characteristic courage and address, but only by a narrow majority of three. So inconsiderable a victory upon so crucial a question was perilously close to a reverse, and when in the succeeding case of the disputed Chippenham Election, the Government were defeated by one, he yielded to the counsels of his advisers, and decided to resign. He was thereupon raised to the peerage as Earl of Orford, with a pension of £4000 a year,* while his daughter by his second wife, Miss Skerret, was created an Earl's daughter in her own right. His fall was mourned by no one more sincerely than by the master he had served so staunchly for so long; and when he went to kiss hands at St. James's upon taking leave, the old King fell upon his neck, kissed him, and broke into tears.

The new Earl himself seems to have taken his reverses with his customary equanimity, and,

* He gave this up at first, but afterwards, when his affairs became involved, reclaimed it (Cunningham's Corr. i, 126 n.).

like the shrewd “old Parliamentary hand” that he was, to have at once devoted himself to the difficult task of breaking the force of the attack which he foresaw would be made upon himself by those in power. He contrived adroitly to foster dissension and disunion among the heterogeneous body of his opponents; he secured that the new Ministry should be mainly composed of his old party, the Whigs; and he managed to discredit his most formidable adversary, Pulteney. One of the first results of these precautionary measures was that a motion by Lord Limerick for a committee to examine into the conduct of the last twenty years was thrown out by a small majority. A fortnight later the motion was renewed in a fresh form, the scope of the examination being limited to the last ten years. Upon this occasion Horace Walpole made his maiden speech, a graceful and modest, if not very forcible, effort on his father’s side. In this instance, however, the Government were successful, and the Committee was appointed. Yet despite the efforts to excite the public mind respecting Lord Orford, the case against him seems to have faded away in the hands of his accusers. The first report of the Committee, issued in May, contained nothing to criminate the person against whom the enquiry had been directly levelled; and despite the strenuous and even shameless efforts of the Government to obtain evidence inculpating the late Minister, the Committee were obliged to issue a second report in June of which—so far as the chief object was concerned—the gross result was nil. By the middle of July, Walpole was able to tell Mann that the “long session was over, and the Secret Committee already forgotten”—as much forgotten, he says in a later letter, “as if it had happened in the last reign.”

When Sir Robert Walpole had resigned, he had quitted his official residence in Downing Street (which ever since he first occupied it in 1735 has been the official residence of the First Lord of the Treasury), and moved to No. 5 Arlington Street, opposite to, but smaller than, the No. 17 in which his youngest son had been born, and upon the site of which William Kent built a larger house for Mr. Pelham. No. 5 is now distinguished by a tablet erected by the Society of Arts proclaiming it to have been the house of the ex-Minister. From Arlington Street, or from the other home at Chelsea already mentioned, most of Walpole's letters were dated during the months which succeeded the crisis. But in August, when the House had risen, he migrated with the rest of the family to Houghton—the great mansion in Norfolk which had now taken the place of the ancient seat of the Walpoles, where during the summer months, his father had been accustomed in his free-handed manner to keep open house to all the county. Fond of hospitality, fond of field-sports, fond of gardening and all out-door occupations, Lord Orford was at home among the flat expanses and Norfolk turnips. But the family seat had no such attractions to his son, fresh from the multi-coloured continental life, and still bearing about him, in a certain frailty of physique and enervation of spirit, the tokens of a sickly childhood. "Next post"—he says despairingly to Mann—"I shall not be able to write to you; and when I am there [at Houghton], shall scarce find materials to furnish a letter above every other post. I beg, however, that you will write constantly to me; it will be my only entertainment; for I neither hunt, brew, drink nor reap." "Consider"—he says again—"I am in the barren land of Norfolk, where news grows as slow as anything green; and besides, I am in the house of a fallen minister!" Writing letters (in company with the little white dog "Patapan" which he had brought from Florence as a successor to the defunct Tory), walking, and playing comet with his sister Lady Mary or any chance visitors to the house, seem to have been his chief resources. A year later he pays a second visit to Houghton, and he is still unreconciled to his environment. "Only imagine that I here every day see men, who are mountains of roast beef, and only just seem roughly hewn into the outlines of human form, like the giant-rock at Pratolino! I shudder when I see them brandish their knives in act to carve, and look on them as savages that devour one another." Then there are the enforced civilities to entirely uninteresting people—the intolerable female relative, who is curious about her cousins to the fortieth remove. "I have an Aunt here, a family piece of goods, an old remnant of inquisitive hospitality and economy, who, to all intents and purposes, is as beefy as her neighbours. She wore me so down yesterday with interrogatories, that I dreamt all night she was at my ear with ‘who’s’ and ‘why’s’ and ‘when’s’ and ‘where’s,’ till at last in my very sleep I cried out ‘for heaven’s sake, madam, ask me no more questions.’” And then, in his impatience of bores in general, he goes on to write a little essay upon that “growth of English root,” that “awful yawn, which sleep cannot abate,” as Byron calls it,—Ennui. “I am so far from growing used to mankind (he means “uncongenial mankind”) by living amongst them, that my natural ferocity and wildness does but every day grow worse. They tire me, they fatigue me; I don’t know what to do with them; I don’t know what to say to them; I fling open the windows, and fancy I want air; and when I get by myself, I undress myself, and seem to have had people in my pockets, in my plaits, and on my shoulders! I indeed find this fatigue worse in the country than in town, because one can avoid it there, and has more resources, but it is there too. I fear ’tis growing old, but I literally seem to have murdered a man whose name was Ennui, for his ghost is ever before me. They say there is no English word for ennui; I think you may translate it most literally by what is called ‘entertaining people’ and ‘doing the honours’; that is, you sit an hour with some one you don’t know and don’t care for, talk about the wind and the weather, and ask a thousand foolish questions, which all begin with, ‘I think you live a great deal in the country,’ or ‘I think you don’t love this thing or that.’ Oh! ’tis dreadful!”*

But even Houghton, with its endless “doing the honours,” must have had its compensations. There was a library, and—what must have had even stronger attractions for Horace Walpole—that magnificent and almost unique collection of pictures which under a later member of the family, the third Earl of Orford, passed to Catherine of Russia. For years Lord Orford, with unwearied diligence and exceptional opportunities, had been accumulating these treasures. Mann in Florence, Vertue in England, and a host of industrious foragers had helped

* Walpole to Chute, 20 August, 1743. Mr. John Chute was a friend whom Walpole had made at Florence, and with whom, as already stated in Chapter ii, Gray had travelled when they parted company. Until, by the death of a brother, he succeeded to the estate called The Vyne in Hampshire, he lived principally abroad. His portrait by Müntz after Pompsio Battoni hung over the door in Walpole’s Bedchamber at Strawberry Hill. An interesting History of the Vyne was published in 1888 by Mr. Chaloner W. Chute, its present possessor.

to bring together the priceless canvasses which crowded the rooms of the Minister's house next the Treasury at Whitehall. And if he was inexperienced as a critic, he was far too acute a man to be deceived by the shiploads of "Holy Families, Madonnas, and other dismal dark subjects, neither entertaining nor ornamental," against which the one great native artist of his time, the painter of the "Rake's Progress," so persistently inveighed. There was no doubt about the pedigrees of the Wouvermanns and Teniers, the Guidos and Rubens, the Vandykes and Murillos, which decorated the rooms at Downing Street and Chelsea and Richmond. From the few records which remain of prices, it would seem that, in addition to the merit of authenticity, many of the pictures must have had the attraction of being "bargains." In days when £4000 or £5000 is no extravagant price to be given for an old master, it is instructive to read that £750 was the largest sum ever given by Lord Orford for any one picture, and Walpole himself quotes this amount as £630. For four great Snyders, which Vertue bought for him, he only paid £428, and for a portrait of Clement IX by Carlo Maratti no more than £200. Many of the other pictures in his gallery cost him still less, being donations—no doubt sometimes in gratitude for favours to come—from his friends and adherents. The Earl of Pembroke, Lord Waldegrave, the Duke of Montagu, Lord Tyrawley, were among these. But upon the whole, the collection was gathered mainly from galleries like the Zambecari at Bologna, the Arnaldi Palace at Florence, the Pallavicini at Rome, and from the stores of noble collectors in England.

In 1743, the majority of these had apparently been concentrated at Houghton, where there was special accommodation for them. "My Lord," says Horace, groaning over a fresh visit to Norfolk, "has pressed me so much that I could not with decency refuse: he is going to furnish and hang his picture-gallery, and wants me." But it is impossible to believe that he really objected to a duty so congenial to his tastes. In fact, he was really greatly interested in it. His letters contain frequent references to a new Domenichino, a Virgin and Child, which Mann is sending from Florence, and he comes up to London to meet this and other pictures, and is not seriously inconsolable to find that owing to the quarantine for the plague on the continent, he is detained for some days in town. One of the best evidences of his solicitude in connection with the arrangements of the Houghton collection is, however, the discourse which he wrote in the summer of 1742 under the title of a Sermon on Painting, and which he himself tells us was actually preached by the Earl's chaplain in the gallery, and afterwards repeated at Stanno, his elder brother's house. The text was taken from Psalm CXV — “They have mouths, but they speak not: eyes have they, but they see not: neither is there any breath in their nostrils,” and the writer, illustrating his theme by reference to the pictures around his audience in the gallery, or dispersed through the building, manages to eulogize the painter’s art with considerable skill. He touches upon the pernicious effect which the closely realised representation of popish miracles must have upon the illiterate spectator, and points out how much more commendable and serviceable is the portraiture of benignity, piety, and chastity — how much more instructive the incidents of the Passion, where every “touch of the pencil is a lesson of contrition, each figure an apostle to call you to repentance." He lays stress, as Lessing and other writers have done, on the universal language of the brush, and indicates its abuse when restricted to the reproduction of inquisitors, visionaries, imaginary hermits, "consecrated gluttons," or "noted concubines," after which (as becomes his father's son) he does not fail to disclose its more fitting vocation, to perpetuate the likeness of William the Deliverer, and the benign, the honest House of Hanover. The Dives and Lazarus of Veronese and the Prodigal Son of Salvator Rosa, both on the walls, are pressed into his service, and the famous Usurers of Quentin Matsys also prompt their parable. Then, after adroitly dwelling upon the pictorial honours lavished upon mere asceticism to the prejudice of real heroes, taking Poussin's picture of Moses Striking the Rock for his text, he winds into what was probably the ultimate purpose of his discourse, a neatly veiled panegyric of Sir Robert Walpole under guise of the great law-giver of the Israelites, which may be cited as a favourable sample of this curious oration:—

"But it is not necessary to dive into profane history for examples of unregarded the merit:

Scriptures themselves contain instances of the greatest patriots, who lie neglected, while new-fashioned bigots or noisy incendiaries are the reigning objects of public veneration. See the great Moses himself ! the lawgiver, the defender, the preserver of Israel ! Peevish orators are more run after, and artful Jesuits more popular. Examine but the life of that slighted patriot, how boldly in his youth he understood the cause of liberty ! Unknown, without interest, he stood against the face of Pharaoh ! He saved his countrymen from the hand of Tyranny, and from the dominion of an idolatrous king : how patiently did he bear, for a series of years, the clamours and cabals of a factious people, wandering after strange lusts, and exasperated by ambitious ringleaders ! How oft did he intercede for their pardon, when injured himself ! How tenderly deny them specious favours, which he knew must turn to their own destruction ! See him lead them through opposition, through plots, through enemies, to the enjoyment of peace, and to the possession of a land flowing with milk and honey! Or with more surprise see him in the barren desert, where sands and wilds overspread the dreary scene, where no hopes of moisture, no prospect of undiscovered springs could flatter their parching thirst, see how with a miraculous hand

‘He struck the rock, and straight the waters flow’d.’

Whoever denies his praises to such evidences of merit, or with jealous look can scowl on such benefits, is like the senseless idol, that has a mouth that speaks not, and eyes that cannot see.”

If, in accordance with some perverse fashion of the day, the foregoing production had not been disguised as a sermon, and actually preached with the orthodox accompaniment of bands and doxology, there is no reason why it should not have been regarded as a harmless and not unaccomplished essay on Art. But the objectionable spirit of parody upon the ritual engendered by the strife between “High” and “Low” (Walpole himself wrote some Lessons for the Day, 1742, which are to be found in the works of Sir Charles Hanbury Williams) seems to have dictated the title of what in other respects is a serious Spectator, and needed no spice of irreverence to render it palatable. The Sermon had, however, one valuable result, namely, that it suggested to its author the expediency of preparing some record of the pictorial riches of Houghton upon the model of the famous Ædes Barberini and Giustinianæ. As the dedication of the Ædes Walpolianæ is dated 24 August, 1743, it must have been written before that date, but it was not actually published until 1747, and then only to give away. Another enlarged and more accurate edition was issued in 1752, and it was finally reprinted in the second volume of the Works of 1798, pp. 221–78, where it is followed by the Sermon on Painting. Professing to be more a catalogue of the pictures than a description of them, it nevertheless gives a good idea of a collection which (as its historian says) both in its extent and the condition of its treasures excelled most of the existing collections of Italy. In an “Introduction,” the characteristics of the various artists are distinguished with much discrimination, although it is naturally more sympathetic than critical. Perhaps one of its happiest pages is the following excursus upon a poem of Prior:—“I cannot conclude this topic of the ancient painters without taking notice of an extreme pretty instance of Prior’s taste, and which may make an example on that frequent subject the resemblance between poetry and painting, and prove that taste in the one will influence in the other. Everybody has read his tale of Protogenes and Apelles. If they have read the story in Pliny they will recollect, that by the latter's account it seemed to have been a trial between two Dutch performers. The Roman author tells you, that when Apelles was to write his name on a board, to let Protogenes know who had been to enquire for him, he drew an exactly straight and slender line. Protogenes returned, and with his pencil, and another colour, divided his competitor's. Apelles, on seeing the ingenious minuteness of the Rhodian master, took a third colour, and laid on a still finer and indivisible line. But the English poet, who could distinguish the emulation of genius from nice experiments about splitting hairs, took the story into his own hands, and in a less number of trials, and with bolder execution, comprehended the whole force of painting, and flung drawing, colouring, and the doctrine of light and shade into the noble contention of those two absolute masters. In Prior, the first wrote his name in a perfect design, and

‘— with one judicious stroke
On the plain ground Apelles drew
A circle regularly true.’

Protagenes knew the hand, and showed Apelles that his own knowledge of colouring was as great as the other’s skill in drawing.

‘Upon the happy line he laid Such obvious light and easy shade,
That Paris’ apple stood confess,
Or Leda’s egg, or Chloe’s breast.’ *

Apelles acknowledged his rival’s merit, without jealousy persisting to refine on the masterly reply :

‘Pugnavere pares, succubuere pares.’ †

Among the other efforts of his pen at this time were some squibs in ridicule of the new Ministry. One was a parody of a scene in Macbeth; the other of a scene in Corneille’s Cinna. He also wrote a paper against Lord Bath in the Old England Journal.

* “Mr. Vertue the engraver made a very ingenious conjecture on this story: he supposes that Apelles did not draw a straight line, but the outline of a human figure, which not being correct, Protagenes drew a more correct figure within his; but that still not being perfect, Apelles drew a smaller and exactly proportioned one within both the former.” (Walpole’s note.)

† Walpole’s Works, 1798, ii, 229–30. The final quotation is from Martial.

In the not very perplexed web of Horace Walpole's life, the next occurrence of importance is his father's death. When, as Sir Robert Walpole, he had ceased to be Prime Minister he was sixty-five years of age, and though his equanimity and wonderful constitution still seemed to befriend him, he had personally little desire, even if the ways had been open, to recover his ancient power. "I believe nothing could prevail on him to return to the Treasury"—writes his son to Mann in 1743. "He says he will keep the 12th of February,—the day he resigned,—with his family as long as he lives." He continued, nevertheless, to assist his old master with his counsel, and more than one step of importance by which the King startled his new Ministry owed its origin to a confidential consultation with Lord Orford. When, in January, 1744, the old question of discontinuing the Hanoverian troops was revived with more than ordinary insistence, it was through Lord Orford's timely exertions, and his personal credit with his friends, that the motion was defeated by an overwhelming majority. On the other hand, a further attempt to harass him by another Committee of Secret Enquiry was wholly unsuccessful, and signs were not wanting that his old prestige had by no means departed. Towards the close of 1744, however, his son begins to chronicle a definite decline in his health. He is evidently suffering seriously from stone, and is forbidden to take the least exercise by the King's serjeant-surgeon, that famous Mr. Ranby who was the friend of Hogarth and Fielding. In January of the next year, he is trying a famous specific for his complaint, Mrs. Stephens's medicine. Six weeks later, he has been alarmingly ill for about a month; and although reckoned out of absolute danger, is hardly ever conscious more than four hours out of the four-and-twenty, from the powerful opiates he takes in order to deaden pain. A month later, on the 18th March, 1745, he died at Arlington Street in his sixty-ninth year. At first his son dares scarcely speak of his loss, but a fortnight afterwards he writes more fully. After showing that the state of his circumstances proved how little truth there had been in the charges of self-enrichment made against him, Walpole goes on to say:—"It is certain, he is dead very poor: his debts, with his legacies, which are trifling, amount to fifty thousand pounds. His estate, a nominal eight thousand a year, much mortgaged. In short his fondness for Houghton has endangered Houghton. If he had not so overdone it, he might have left such an estate to his family as might have secured the glory of the place for many years: another such debt must expose it to sale. If he had lived his unbounded generosity and contempt of money would have run him into vast difficulties. However irreparable his personal loss may be to his friends, he certainly did critically well for himself: he had lived to stand the rudest trials with honour, to see his character universally cleared, his enemies brought to infamy for their ignorance or villainy, and the world allowing him to be the only man in England fit to be what he had been, and he died at a time when his age and infirmities prevented his again undertaking the support of a government, which engrossed his whole care, and which he foresaw was falling into the last confusion. In this I hope his judgment failed! His fortune attended him to the last, for he died of the most painful of all distempers, with little or no pain." *

* Walpole to Mann, 15 April, 1745.

From the Short Notes we learn further:—
“He [my father] left me the house in Arlington-street in which he died, £5000 in money, and £1000 a year from the Collector’s place in the Custom-house, and the surplus to be divided between my brother Edward and me.”

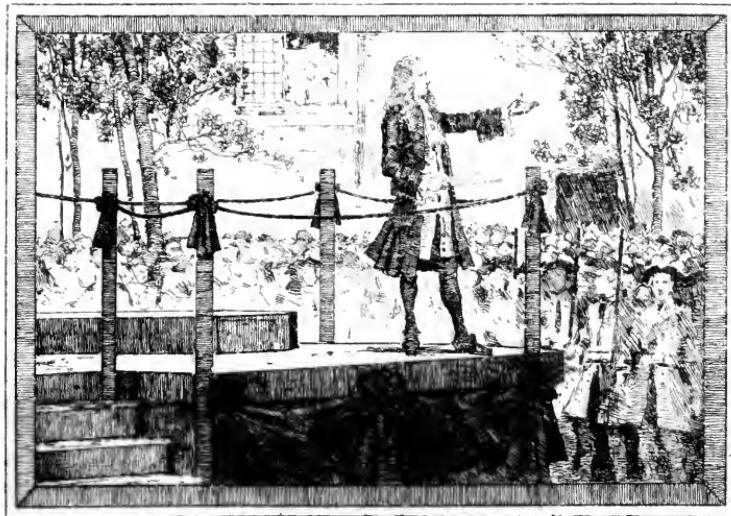

PERCY-MORAN

CHAPTER IV.

Stage-gossip and small-talk ; Ranelagh Gardens ; Fontenoy and Leicester House ; echoes of the '45 ; Preston Pans ; Culloden ; trial of the Rebel Lords ; deaths of Kilmarnock and Balmerino ; epilogue to “Tamerlane” ; Walpole and his relations ; Lady Orford ; literary efforts ; The Beauties ; takes a house at Windsor.

IV.

DURING the period between Walpole's return to England and the death of Lord Orford, his letters, addressed almost exclusively to Mann, are largely occupied with the occurrences which accompanied and succeeded his father's downfall. To Lord Orford's protégé and relative these particulars were naturally of the first importance, and Walpole's function of "General Intelligencer" fell proportionately into the background. Still there are occasional references to current events of a merely social character. After the secret Committee, he is interested (probably because his friend Conway was pecuniarily interested) in the Opera, and the reception by the British public of the Viscontina, Amorevoli, and the other Italian singers whom he had known abroad. Of the stage he says comparatively little, dismissing poor Mrs. Woffington, who had then just made her appearance at Covent Garden, as "a bad actress" who nevertheless "has life"—an opinion in which he is supported by Conway, who calls her "an impudent Irish-faced girl." In the acting of Garrick, after whom all the town is (as Gray says) "horn-mad" in May, 1742, he sees nothing wonderful, although he admits that it is heresy to say so, since that infallible stage critic, the Duke of Argyll, has declared him superior to Betterton. But he praises "a little simple farce" at Drury Lane, Miss Lucy in Town, by Henry Fielding, in which his future friend, Mrs. Clive, and Beard mimic Amorevoli and the Muscovita. The same letter contains a reference to another famous stage-queen, now nearing eighty, Anne Bracegirdle, who should have had the money that Congreve left to Henrietta,

Duchess of Marlborough. “Tell Mr. Chute (he says) that his friend Bracegirdle breakfasted with me this morning. As she went out, and wanted her clogs, she turned to me, and said, ‘I remember at the playhouse, they used to call, Mrs. Oldfield’s chair! Mrs. Barry’s clogs! and Mrs. Bracegirdle’s pattens!’”* One pictures a handsome old lady, a little bent, and leaning on a crutch stick as she delivers this parting utterance at the door.†

Among the occurrences of 1742 which find fitting record in the correspondence, is the opening of that formidable rival to Vauxhall, Ranelagh Gardens. All through the spring the great Rotunda, with its encircling tiers of galleries and supper-boxes,—the coup d’œil of which Johnson thought was the finest thing he had ever seen, had been rising slowly at

* Walpole to Mann, 26 May, 1742.

† According to Pinkerton, another anecdote connects Mrs. Bracegirdle with the Walpoles. “Mr. Shorter, my mother’s father (he makes Horace say), was walking down Norfolk Street in the Strand, to his house there, just before poor Mountfort the player was killed in that street, by assassins hired by Lord Mohun. This nobleman, lying in wait for his prey, came up and embraced Mr. Shorter, by mistake, saying ‘Dear Mountfort!’ It was fortunate that he was instantly undeceived, for Mr. Shorter had hardly reached his house before the murder took place” (Walpoliana, ii, 96). Mountfort it will be remembered owed his death to Mrs. Bracegirdle’s liking for him.

the side of Chelsea Hospital. In April it was practically completed and ready for visitors. Walpole of course breakfasts there like the rest of the beau monde. “The building is not finished (he says), but they get great sums by people going to see it and breakfasting in the house: there were yesterday no less than three hundred and eighty persons, at eighteenpence a piece. You see how poor we are, when, with a tax of four shillings in the pound, we are laying out such sums for cakes and ale.”* A week or two later it was opened officially. “Two nights ago Ranelagh-gardens were opened at Chelsea; the Prince, Princess, Duke, much nobility, and much mob besides, were there. There is a vast amphitheatre, finely gilt, painted and illuminated, into which everybody that loves eating, drinking, staring, or crowding, is admitted for twelvepence. The building and disposition of the gardens cost sixteen thousand pounds. Twice a week there are to be Ridottos at guinea-tickets, for which you are to have a supper and music. I was there last night [May 25],—the writer adds—

* Walpole to Mann, 22 April, 1742.

but did not find the joy of it,"* and, at present, he prefers Vauxhall because of the approach by water, that trajet du fleuve fatal—as it is styled in the Vauxhall de Londres which a French poet dedicated in 1769 to M. de Fontenelle. He seems, however, to have taken Lord Orford to Ranelagh, and he records in July that they walked with a train at their heels like two chairmen going to fight—from which he argues a return of his father's popularity. Two years later Fashion has declared itself on the side of the new garden, and Walpole has gone over to the side of Fashion. “Every night constantly (he tells Conway) I go to Ranelagh; which has totally beat Vauxhall. Nobody goes anywhere else—everybody goes there. My Lord Chesterfield is so fond of it, that he says he has ordered all his letters to be directed thither. If you had never seen it, I would make you a most pompous description of it, and tell you how the floor is all of beaten princes,—that you can't set your foot without treading on a Prince of Wales or Duke of Cumberland. The company is universal: there is from his Grace of Grafton down to children out of the Foundling Hospital, from my Lady Townshend to the kitten—from my Lord Sandys to your humble cousin and sincere friend.”*

* Walpole to Mann, 26 May, 1742.

After Lord Orford’s death, the next landmark in Horace Walpole’s life is his removal to the house at Twickenham, subsequently known as Strawberry Hill. To a description of this historical mansion the next chapter will be in part devoted. In the mean time, we may linger for a moment upon the record which these letters contain of the famous ’45. No better opportunity will probably occur of exhibiting Walpole as the reporter of history in the process of making. Much that he tells Mann and Montagu is no doubt little more than the skimming of the last Gazette, but he had always access to trustworthy information, and is seldom a dull reporter even of newspaper news. Almost the next letter to that in which he dwells at length upon the loss of his father, records the disaster of Tournay or Fontenoy, in which, he tells Mann, Mr. Conway has highly distinguished himself, magnificently engaging—as appears from a subsequent communication—no less than two French grenadiers at once. His account of the battle is bare enough; but what apparently interests him most is the patriotic conduct of the Prince of Wales, who made a chanson on the occasion after the fashion of the Regent Orleans:—

* Walpole to Conway, 29 June, 1744.

“Venez, mes chères Déesses, Venez calmer mon chagrin;
Aidez, mes belles Princesses,
A le noyer dans le vin.
Poussons cette douce Ivresse Jusqu’au milieu de la nuit,
Et n’écoutons que la tendresse
D’un charmant vis-à-vis.

* * *

“Que m’importe, que l’Europe
Ait un, ou plusieurs tyrans?
Prions seulement Calliope, Qu’elle inspire nos vers, nos chants.
Laissons Mars et toute la gloire;
Livrons nous tous à l’amour;
Que Bacchus nous donne à boire;
A ces deux fasions (sic) la cour.”

The goddesses addressed were Lady Catherine Hanmer, Lady Fauconberg, and Lady Middlesex, who played Congreve’s Judgment of Paris at Leicester House, with His Royal Highness as Paris, and Prince Lobkowitz for Mercury. Walpole says of the song that it "miscarried in nothing but the language, the thoughts, and the poetry." Yet he copies the whole five verses, of which the above are two, for Mann's delectation.

A more logical sequence to Fontenoy than the lyric of Leicester House, is the descent of Charles Edward upon Scotland. In August Walpole reports to Mann that there is a proclamation out "for apprehending the Pretender's son," who had landed in July; in September he is marching on Edinburgh. Ten days later the writer is speculating half ruefully upon the possibilities of being turned out of his comfortable sinecures in favour of some forlorn Irish Peer. "I shall wonderfully dislike being a loyal sufferer in a thread-bare coat, and shivering in an ante-chamber at Hanover, or reduced to teach Latin and English to the young princes at Copenhagen. The Dowager Strafford has already written cards for my Lady Nithsdale, my Lady Tullibardine, the Duchess of Perth and Berwick, and twenty more revived peeresses, to invite them to play at whisk, Monday three months: for your part, you will divert yourself with their old taffeties, and tarnished slippers, and their awkwardness, the first day they go to Court in shifts and clean linen. Will you ever write to me in my garret at Herrenhausen?"* Then upon this come the contradictions of rumour, the "general supineness," the raising of regiments, and the disaster of Preston Pans, with its inevitable condemnation of Cope. "I pity poor him, who with no shining abilities, and no experience, and no force, was sent to fight for a crown! He never saw a battle but that of Dettingen, where he got his red ribbon: Churchill, whose led-captain he was, and my Lord Harrington, had pushed him up to this misfortune.† We have lost all our artillery, five hundred men taken—and three killed, and several officers, as you will see in the papers. This defeat has frightened everybody but those it rejoices, and those it should frighten most; but my Lord Granville still buoys up the King's spirits, and persuades him it is nothing."‡

* Walpole to Mann, 17 Sept., 1745.

† Walpole later revised this verdict:—"General Cope was tried afterwards for his behaviour in this action, and it appeared very clearly, that the Ministry, his inferior officers, and his troops, were greatly to blame: and that he did all he could, so ill-directed, so ill-supplied, and so ill-obeyed."

‡ Walpole to Mann, 27 Sept., 1745.

Nothing, indeed, it proved in the issue. But Walpole was wiser in his immediate apprehensions than King George's advisers, who were not wise. In his subsequent letters we get scattered glimpses of the miserable story that ended in Culloden. Towards the end of October he is auguring hopefully from the protracted neglect of the rebels to act upon their success. In November they are in England. But the backwardness of the Jacobites to join them is already evident, and he writes "in the greatest confidence of our getting over this ugly business." Early in December they have reached Derby, only to be soon gone again, miserably harassed, and leaving their sick and cannon behind. With the new year come tidings to Mann that the rebellion is dying down in England, and that General Hawley has marched northward to put it quite out. Once more, on the 23rd February, it flares fitfully at Falkirk, and then fades as suddenly. The battle that Walpole hourly expects, not without some trepidation, for Conway is one of the Duke of Cumberland's aides-de-camp, is still deferred, and it is April before the two armies face each other on Culloden Moor. Then he writes jubilantly to his Florentine correspondent:—"On the 16th, the Duke, by forced marches, came up with the rebels, a little on this side Inverness—by the way, the battle is not christened yet, I only know that neither Preston Pans nor Falkirk are to be god-fathers. The rebels who had fled from him after their victory [of Falkirk], and durst not attack him, when so much exposed to them at his passage of the Spey, now stood him, they seven thousand, he ten. They broke through Barril's regiment and killed Lord Robert Ker, a handsome young gentleman, who was cut to pieces with above thirty wounds; but they were soon repulsed, and fled; the whole engagement not lasting above a quarter of an hour. The young Pretender escaped; Mr. Conway says, he hears, wounded: he certainly was in the rear. They have lost above a thousand men in the engagement and pursuit; and six hundred were already taken; among which latter are their French Ambassador and Earl Kilmarnock. The Duke of Perth and Lord Ogilvie are said to be slain. . . . Except Lord Robert Ker we lost nobody of note: Sir Robert Rich's eldest son has lost his hand, and about a hundred and thirty private men fell. The defeat is reckoned total, and the dispersion general; and all their artillery is taken. It is a brave young Duke! The town is all blazing round me [i. e., at Arlington Street], as I write, with fire works and illuminations: I have some inclination to wrap up half-a-dozen sky-rockets, to make you drink the Duke's health. Mr. Dodington [in Pall Mall], on the first report, came out with a very pretty illumination; so pretty, that I believe he had it by him, ready for any occasion."*

Walpole's account of these occurrences is, of course, hearsay, although, as regards Culloden, he probably derived the details from Conway, who was present. But in some of the events which ensued, he is either actually a spectator himself, or fresh from direct communication with those who have been spectators. One of the most graphic passages in his entire correspondence is his description of the trial of the rebel lords, at which he assisted; and another is his narrative of the executions of Kilmarnock and Balmerino, written down from the relation of eye-witnesses. It is hardly possible to get much nearer to history.

* Walpole to Mann, 25 April, 1746.

"I am this moment come from the conclusion of the greatest and most melancholy scene I ever yet saw! You will easily guess it was the Trials of the rebel Lords. As it was the most interesting sight, it was the most solemn and fine: a coronation is a puppet-show, and the splendour of it idle; but this sight at once feasted one's eyes and engaged all one's passions. It began last Monday; three parts of Westminster-hall were inclosed with galleries, and hung with scarlet; and the whole ceremony was conducted with the most awful solemnity and decency, except in the one point of leaving the prisoners at the bar, amidst the idle curiosity of some crowd, and even with the witnesses who had sworn against them, while the Lords adjourned to their own House to consult. No part of the royal family was there, which was a proper regard to the unhappy men, who were become their victims. . . . I had armed myself with all the resolution I could, with the thought of their crimes, and of the danger past, and was assisted by the sight of the Marquis of Lothian in weepers for his son [Lord Robert Ker] who fell at Culloden—but the first appearance of the prisoners shocked me! their behaviour melted me." After going on to speak of Lord Kilmarnock and Lord Cromartie (afterwards reprieved) he continues:—"For Lord Balmerino, he is the most natural brave old fellow I ever saw: the highest intrepidity, even to indifference. At the bar he behaved like a soldier and a man; in the intervals of form, with carelessness and humour. He pressed extremely to have his wife, his pretty Peggy [Margaret Chalmers], with him in the Tower. Lady Cromartie only sees her husband through the grate, not choosing to be shut up with him, as she thinks she can serve him better by her intercession without: she is big with child and very handsome: so are their daughters. When they were to be brought from the Tower in separate coaches, there was some dispute in which the axe must go—old Balmerino cried, 'Come, come, put it with me.' At the bar he plays with his fingers upon the axe, while he talks to the gentleman-gaoler; and one day somebody coming up to listen, he took the blade and held it like a fan between their faces. During the trial, a little boy was near him, but not tall enough to see; he made room for the child and placed him near himself." *

* Walpole to Mann, 1 Aug., 1746.

Balmerino's gallant demeanour evidently fascinated Walpole. In his next letter he relates how on his way back to the Tower the sturdy old dragoon had stopped the coach at Charing Cross to buy some "honey-blobs" (gooseberries); and when afterwards he comes to write his account of the execution, although he tells the story of Kilmarnock's death with feeling, the best passage is given to his companion in misfortune. He describes how (on the fatal 15th August), before he left the Tower, Balmerino drank a bumper to King James; how he wore his rebellious regimentals (blue and red) over a flannel waistcoat and his shroud; how embracing Lord Kilmarnock he said, "My Lord, I wish I could suffer for both." Then followed the beheading of Kilmarnock, and the narrator goes on:—"The scaffold was immediately new-strewed with saw dust, the block new-covered, the executioner new-dressed, and a new axe brought. Then came old Balmerino, treading with the air of a general. As soon as he mounted the scaffold, he read the inscription on his coffin as he did again afterwards: he then surveyed the spectators, who were in amazing numbers, even upon masts upon ships in the river; and pulling out his spectacles read a treasonable speech, which he delivered to the Sheriff, and said, the young Pretender was so sweet a Prince, that flesh and blood could not resist following him; and lying down to try the block, he said, ‘If I had a thousand lives, I would lay them all down here in the same cause!’ He said, if he had not taken the sacrament the day before, he would have knocked down Williamson, the Lieutenant of the Tower, for his ill-usage of him. He took the axe and felt it and asked the headsman how many blows he had given Lord Kilmarnock; and gave him three guineas. Two clergymen, who attended him, coming up, he said, ‘No, gentlemen, I believe you have already done me all the service you can.’ Then he went to the corner of the scaffold, and called very loud for the warder to give him his perriwig, which he took off, and put on a night-cap of Scotch plaid, and then pulled off his coat and waistcoat and lay down; but being told he was on the wrong side, vaulted round, and immediately gave the sign by tossing up his arm, as if he were giving the signal for battle. He received three blows, but the first certainly took away all sensation. He was not a quarter of an hour on the scaffold;

Lord Kilmarnock above half a one. Balmerino certainly died with the intrepidity of a hero, but the insensibility of one too. As he walked from his prison to execution, seeing every window and top of house filled with spectators, he cried out, ‘Look, look, how they are all piled up like rotten oranges.’’*

In the old print of the execution, the scaffold on Tower Hill is shown surrounded by a wide square of dragoons, beyond which the crowd—“the immense display of human countenances which surrounded it like a sea,” as Scott has it—are visible on every side. No. 14 Tower Hill is said to have been the house from which the two lords were led to the block, and a trail of blood along the hall and up the first flight of stairs was long shown as indicating the route by which their mutilated bodies were borne to await interment in St. Peter’s Chapel. A few months later Walpole records the execution in

* Walpole to Mann, 21 August, 1746. Gray, who was at the trial, also mentions Balmerino, not so enthusiastically. “He is an old soldier-like man, of a vulgar manner and aspect, speaks the broadest Scotch, and shews an intrepidity, that some ascribe to real courage, and some to brandy” (Letter to Wharton, August). “Old Balmerino, when he had read his paper to the people, pulled off his spectacles, spit upon his handkerchief, and wiped them clean for the use of his posterity; and that is the last page of his history” (Letter to Wharton, 11 Sept., 1746).

the same place of Simon Fraser, Lord Lovat, the cunning old Jacobite whose characteristic attitude and “pawky” expression live forever in the admirable sketch which Hogarth made of him at St. Albans. He died (says Walpole) “extremely well, without passion, affectation, buffoonery, or timidity.” But he is not so distinguished as either Kilmarnock or Balmerino, and, however Roman his taking-off, the chief memorable thing about it is, that it was happily the last of these sanguinary scenes in this country. The only other incident which it is here needful to chronicle in connection with the “Forty Five” is Walpole’s verses on the Suppression of the late Rebellion. On the 4th and 5th November, the anniversaries of King William’s birth and landing, it was the custom to play Rowe’s Tamerlane, and this year (1746) the epilogue spoken by Mrs. Pritchard “in the character of the Comic Muse” was from Walpole’s pen. According to the writer special terrors had threatened the stage from the advent of “Rome’s young missionary spark,” the Chevalier, and the Tragic Muse, raising, “to eyes well-tutored in the trade of grief,” “a small and well-lac’d handkerchief,” is represented by her lighter sister as bewailing the prospect to her “buskin’d progeny” after this fashion :—

“ Ah sons, our dawn is over-cast ; and all Theatric glories nodding to their fall.
From foreign realms a bloody chief is come,
Big with the work of slav’ry and of Rome.
A general ruin on his sword he wears,
Fatal alike to audience and to play’rs.
For ah ! my sons, what freedom for the stage
When bigotry with sense shall battle wage ?
When monkish laureats only wear the bays,
Inquisitors lord chamberlains of plays ?
Plays shall be damn’d that ’scap’d the critic’s rage
For priests are still worse tyrants to the stage.
Cato, received by audiences so gracious, Shall find ten Cæsars in one St. Ignatius,
And god-like Brutus here shall meet again
His evil genius as a capuchin.
For heresy the fav’rites of the pit
Must burn, and excommunicated wit ;
And at one stake, we shall behold expire
My Anna Bullen, and the Spanish Fryar.” *

After this the epilogue digresses into a comparison of the Duke of Cumberland with King William. Virgil, Juvenal, Addison, Dryden, and Pope, upon one of whose lines on Cibber Walpole bases his reference to the Lord Chamberlain, are all laid under contribution in this performance. It “succeeded to flatter me”—he tells Mann a few days later,—a Gallicism from which we must infer an enthusiastic reception.

* Walpole’s Works, 1798, i, 25-7.

Walpole's personal and domestic history does not present much interest at this period. Of his sister Mary (Catherine Shorter's daughter), who had married the Earl of Cholmondeley, we hear little or nothing. In February, 1746, his half sister, Lady Maria, his partner at comet in the Houghton days, married Mr. Churchill—“a foolish match,” says Horace, to which he will have nothing to say. With his second brother, Sir Edward Walpole, he seems to have had but little intercourse, and that scarcely of a fraternal character. In 1857, Cunningham published for the first time a very angry letter from Edward to his junior, in which the latter was bitterly reproached for his interference in disposing of the family borough of Castle Rising, and (incidentally) for his assumption of superiority, mental and otherwise. To this communication Walpole prepared a most caustic and categorical answer, which, however, he never sent. For his nieces, Edward Walpole's natural daughters, of whom it will be more convenient to speak later, Horace seems always to have felt a sincere regard. But although his brother had tastes which must have been akin to his own, for Edward Walpole was in his way an art patron (Roubiliac the sculptor, for instance, was much indebted to him) and a respectable musician, no real cordiality ever existed between them. "There is nothing in the world"—he tells Montagu—"the Baron of Englefield has such an aversion for as his brother."*

For his elder brother's wife, the Lady Walpole who had formed one of the learned trio at Florence, he entertained no kind of respect, and his letters are full of flouts at Her Ladyship's manners and morality. Indeed, between préciosité and "Platonic love," her life does not appear to have been a particularly worshipful one, and her long sojourn under Italian skies had not improved her. At present she was Lady Orford, her husband, who is seldom mentioned, and from whom she had been living apart, having succeeded to the title at his father's death. From Walpole's letters to Mann, it seems that in April, 1745, she was, much to the dismay of her relatives, already preening her wings for England. In September, she has arrived, and Walpole is maliciously delighted at the cold welcome she obtains from the Court and from society in general, with the exception of her old colleague, Lady Pomfret, and, that in one sense congenial spirit, Lady Townshend. Later on, a definite separation from her husband appears to have been agreed upon, which Walpole fondly hopes may have the effect of bringing about her departure for Italy. "The Ladies O[rford] and T[ownshend]" —he says—"have exhausted scandal both in their persons and conversations." However much this may be exaggerated (and Walpole never spares his antipathies), the last we hear of Lady Orford is certainly on his side — for she has retired from town to a villa near Richmond with a lover for whom she has postponed that southward flight which her family so ardently desired. This fortunate Endymion, the Hon. Sewallis Shirley, son of Robert, first Earl Ferrers, had already been one of the most favoured lovers of the notorious "lady of quality" whose memoirs were afterwards foisted into Peregrine Pickle. To Lady Vane now succeeded Lady Orford, as eminent for wealth — says sarcastic Lady Mary Wortley Montagu—as her predecessor had been for beauty, and equal in “her heroic contempt for shame.” This new connection was destined to endure. It was in September, 1746, that Walpole chronicled his sister-in-law’s latest frailty, and in May, 1751, only a few weeks after her husband’s death,* she married Shirley at the Rev. Alexander Keith’s convenient “little chapel in May Fair.”

* Englefield, i. e.—Englefield of Cooper's Hill, near Windsor, Green, in Berks., on the summit where Edward Walpole lived.

In 1744, died Alexander Pope, to be followed a year later by the great Dean of St. Patrick’s. Neither of these events leaves any lasting mark in Walpole’s correspondence, indeed of Swift’s death there is no mention at all. A nearer bereavement was the premature loss of West, which had taken place three years before, closing sorrowfully with faint accomplishment a life of promise. Vale, et vive paulisper cum vivis—he had written a few days earlier to Gray—his friend to the last. With Gray, Walpole’s friendship, as will be seen presently, had been resumed. His own literary essays still lie chiefly in the domain of squib and jeu d’esprit. In April, 1746, over the appropriate signature of “Descartes," he printed in No. II of The Museum a "Scheme for Raising a Large Sum of Money for the Use of the Government, by laying a tax on Message-Cards and Notes," and in No. V a pretended Advertisement and Table of Contents for a History of Good Breeding, from the Creation of the World, by the Author of the Whole Duty of Man. The wit of this is a little laboured, and scarcely goes beyond the announcement that "The Eight last Volumes, which relate to Germany, may be had separate," nor does that of the other exceed a mild reflection of Fielding's manner in some of his minor pieces. Among other things, we gather that it was the custom of the fine ladies of the day to send open messages on blank playing-cards, and it is stated as a fact or a fancy that "after the fatal day of Fontenoy," persons of quality "all wrote their notes on Indian paper, which being red, when inscribed with Japan ink, made a melancholy military kind of elegy on the brave youths who occasioned the fashion, and were often the honourable subject of the epistle." The only remaining effort of any importance at this time is the little poem of The Beauties, somewhat recalling Gay's Prologue to the Shepherd's Week, and written in July, 1746, to Eckardt the painter.

* Robert Walpole, second Earl eldest brother, died in March, of Orford, Horace Walpole’s 1751.

Here is a specimen:—

“ In smiling CAPEL’S bounteous look Rich autumn’s goddess is mistook.
With poppies, and with spiky corn,
Eckardt, her nut-brown curls adorn ;
And by her side, in decent line,
Place charming BERKELEY, Proserpine.
Mild as a summer sea, serene,
In dimpled beauty next be seen AYLESB’RY, like hoary Neptune’s queen.
With her the light-dispensing fair,
Whose beauty gilds the morning air,
And bright as her attendant sun,
The new Aurora, LYTTELTON.
Such Guido’s pencil beauty-tip’d,
And in ethereal colours dip’d,
In measur’d dance to tuneful song
Drew the sweet goddess, as along Heaven’s azure ’neath their light feet spread The buxom hours the fairest led.”*

“ Charming Berkeley,” here mentioned, afterwards became the third wife of Goldsmith’s friend, Earl Nugent, and the mother of the little girl who played tricks upon the author of She Stoops to Conquer at her father’s country seat of Gosfield; “ Aylesb’ry, like hoary Neptune’s queen,” married Walpole’s friend, Henry Conway, and “ the new Aurora, Lyttelton,” was that charming Lucy Fortescue upon whose death her husband wrote the monody so pitilessly parodied by Smollett.* Lady Almeria Carpenter, Lady Emily Lenox, Miss Chudleigh (afterwards the notorious Duchess of Kingston), and many other well-known names, quos nunc perscribere longum est, are also celebrated.

* Walpole’s Works, 1798, i, 21–2.

In August, 1746, Walpole announces to Mann that he has taken a pretty house within the precincts of the castle at Windsor, to which he is going for the remainder of the summer. In September he has entered upon residence, for Gray tells Wharton that he sees him "usually once a week." "All is mighty free, and even friendly more than one could expect"—and one of the first things posted off to Conway, is Gray's Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College, which the sender desires he "will please to like excessively." He is drawn from his retreat by the arrival of a young Florentine friend, the Marquis Rinuncini, to whom he has to do the

* Writing to Walpole in March, 1751, Gray says—"In the last volume [of Peregrine Pickle] is a character of Mr. Lyttelton, under the name of 'Gosling Scrag,' and a parody of part of his monody, under the notion of a Pastoral on the death of his Grandmother" (Works, by Gosse, 1884, ii, 214).

London honours. "I stayed literally an entire week with him, carried him to see palaces and Richmond gardens and park, and Chenevix's shop, and talked a great deal to him alle conversazioni."^{*} "Chenevix's shop" suggests the main subject of the next chapter—the purchase and occupation of Strawberry Hill.

* Walpole to Mann, 15 Sept., 1746.

CHAPTER V.

The new house at Twickenham ; its first tenants ; christened “Strawberry Hill” ; planting and embellishing ; fresh additions ; Walpole’s description of it in 1753 ; visitors and admirers ; Lord Bath’s verses ; some rival mansions ; minor literature ; robbed by James M’Lean ; sequel from “The World” ; the M’Lean mania ; high life at Vauxhall ; contributions to “The World” ; Theodore of Corsica ; reconciliation with Gray ; stimulates his works ; the “Poëmata-Grayo-Bentleiana” ; Richard Bentley ; Müntz the artist ; dwellers at Twickenham ; Lady Suffolk and Mrs. Clive.

V.

ON the 5th of June, 1747, Walpole announces to Mann that he has taken a little new farm, just out of Twickenham. “The house is so small, that I can send it to you in a letter to look at: the prospect is as delightful as possible, commanding the river, the town [Twickenham], and Richmond Park; and being situated on a hill descends to the Thames through two or three little meadows, where I have some Turkish sheep and two cows, all studied in their colours for becoming the view. This little rural bijou was Mrs. Chenevix's, the toy-woman à la mode, who in every dry season is to furnish me with the best rain water from Paris, and now and then with some Dresden-china cows, who are to figure like wooden classics in a library: so I shall grow as much a shepherd as any swain in the Astræa." Three days later, further details are added in a letter to Conway, then in Flanders with the Duke of Cumberland:—" You perceive by my date [Twickenham, 8 June] that I am got into a new camp, and have left my tub at Windsor. It is a little play-thing-house, that I got out of Mrs. Chenevix's shop, and is the prettiest bauble you ever saw. It is set in enamelled meadows, with filigree hedges:—

"‘A small Euphrates through the piece is roll'd, And little finches wave their wings in gold.’*

"Two delightful roads, that you would call dusty, supply me continually with coaches and chaises: barges as solemn as Barons of the Exchequer move under my window; Richmond

* This is slightly varied from a couplet in Pope's fifth Moral Essay ("To Mr. Addison: Occasioned by his Dialogues on Medals").

Hill and Ham Walks bound my prospect; . . . Dowagers as plenty as flounders inhabit all around, and Pope's ghost is just now skimming under my window by a most poetical moonlight. I have about land enough to keep such a farm as Noah's, when he set up in the ark with a pair of each kind; but my cottage is rather cleaner than I believe his was after they had been cooped up together forty days. The Chenevixes had tricked it out for themselves: up two pair of stairs is what they call Mr. Chenevix's library, furnished with three maps, one shelf, a bust of Sir Isaac Newton, and a lame telescope without any glasses. Lord John Sackville predeceased me here, and instituted certain games called cricketalia, which have been celebrated this very evening in honour of him in a neighbouring meadow." *

The house thus fantastically described, which grew into the Gothic structure afterwards so closely associated with its owner's name, was not, even at this date, without its history. It stood on the left bank of the Thames, at the corner of the Upper Road to Teddington, not very far from Twickenham itself. It had been built about 1698 as a “country box” by a retired coachman of the Earl of Bradford, and, from the fact that he was supposed to have acquired his means by starving his master’s horses, was known popularly as Chopped-Straw Hall. Its first possessor not long afterwards let it out as a lodging-house, and finally, after several improvements, sub-let it altogether. One of its first tenants was Colley Cibber, who found it convenient when he was in attendance for acting at Hampton Court; and he is said to have written in it the comedy called The Refusal; or, the Ladies’ Philosophy, produced at Drury Lane in 1721. Then, for eight years, it was rented by the Bishop of Durham, Dr. Talbot, who was reported to have kept in it a better table than the extent of its kitchen seemed, in Walpole’s judgment, to justify. After the Bishop came a Marquis, Henry Bridges, son of the Duke of Chandos; after the Marquis, Mrs. Chenevix, the toy-woman who, upon her husband’s death, let it for two years to the nobleman who preceded Walpole, Lord John Philip Sackville. Before this Mrs. Chenevix had taken lodgers, one of whom was the celebrated theologian, Père Le Courrayer. At the expiration of Lord Sackville's tenancy, Walpole took the remainder of Mrs. Chenevix's lease; and in 1748 had grown to like the situation so much that he obtained a special act to purchase the fee simple from the existing possessors, three minors of the name of Mortimer. The price he paid was £1356 10s. Nothing was then wanting but the name, and in looking over some old deeds this was supplied. He found that the ground on which it stood had been known originally as "Strawberry-Hill-Shot." "You shall hear from me," he tells Mann in June, 1748, "from STRAWBERRY HILL, which I have found out in my lease is the old name of my house; so pray, never call it Twickenham again."

* Walpole to Conway, 8 June, 1747.

The transformation of the toy-woman's "villa-kin" into a Gothic residence was not, however, the operation of a day. Indeed, at first, the idea of rebuilding does not seem to have entered its new owner's mind. But he speedily set about extending his boundaries, for before 26 December, 1748, he has added nine acres to his original five, making fourteen in all—a "territory prodigious in a situation where land is so scarce." Among the tenants of some of the buildings which he acquired in making these additions was Richard Franklyn, the printer of the Craftsman, who, during Sir Robert Walpole's administration, had been taken up for printing that paper. He occupied a small house in what was afterwards known as the Flower Garden, and Walpole permitted him to retain it during his life-time. Walpole's letters towards the close of 1748 contain numerous references to his assiduity in planting. "My present and sole occupation," he says in August, "is planting, in which I have made great progress, and talk very learnedly with the nurserymen, except that now and then a lettuce run to seed overturns all my botany, as I have more than once taken it for a curious West-Indian flowering shrub. Then the deliberation with which trees grow, is extremely inconvenient to my natural impatience." Two months later he is "all plantation, and sprouts away like any chaste nymph in the Metamorphosis." In December, we begin to hear of that famous lawn so well known in the later history of the house. He is "making a terrace the whole breadth of his garden on the brow of a natural hill, with meadows at the foot, and commanding the river, the village [Twickenham], Richmond-hill, and the park, and part of Kingston." A year after this (September, 1749), while he is still "digging and planting till it is dark," come the first dreams of building. At Cheney's, in Buckinghamshire, he has seen some old stained glass, in the windows of an ancient house which had been degraded into a farm, and he thinks he will beg it of the Duke of Bedford (to whom the farm belongs), as it would be "magnificent for Strawberry-castle." Evidently he has discussed this (as yet) château en Espagne with Montagu. "Did I tell you (he says) that I have found a text in Deuteronomy to authorise my future battlements? 'When thou buildest a new house, then shalt thou make a battlement for thy roof, that thou bring not blood upon thy house, if any man fall from thence.'" In January, the new building is an established fact, as far as purpose is concerned. In a postscript to Mann he writes:—"I must trouble you with a commission, which I don't know whether you can execute. I am going to build a little gothic castle at Strawberry Hill. If you can pick me up any fragments of old painted glass, arms, or anything, I shall be excessively obliged to you. I can't say I remember any such things in Italy;

but out of old chateaus, I imagine, one might get it cheap, if there is any."

From a subsequent letter it would seem that Mann, as a resident in Italy, had rather expostulated against the style of architecture which his friend was about to adopt, and had suggested the Grecian. But Walpole, rightly or wrongly, knew what he intended. "The Grecian," he said, was "only proper for magnificent and public buildings. Columns and all their beautiful ornaments, look ridiculous when crowded into a closet or a cheesecake-house. The variety is little, and admits no charming irregularities. I am almost as fond of the Sharawaggi, or Chinese want of symmetry, in buildings, as in grounds or gardens. I am sure, whenever you come to England, you will be pleased with the liberty of taste into which we are struck, and of which you can have no idea." The passage shows that he himself anticipated some of the ridicule which was levelled by unsympathetic people at the "oyster-grotto-like-profanation" which he gradually erected by the Thames. In the meantime it went on progressing slowly, as its progress was entirely dependent on his savings out of income, and the references to it in his letters, perhaps because Mann was doubtful, are not abundant. "The library, and refectory or great parlour," he says in his description, "were entirely new built in 1753; the gallery, round tower, great cloyster, and cabinet, in 1760 and 1761; and the great north bedchamber in 1770." To speak of these later alterations would be to anticipate too much, and the further description of Strawberry Hill will be best deferred until his own account of the house and contents was printed in 1774, four years after the last addition above recorded. But even before he made the earliest of them, he must have done much to alter and improve the aspect of the place, for Gray, more admiring than Mann, praises what has been done. "I am glad," he tells Wharton, "that you enter into the spirit of Strawberry-castle. It has a purity and propriety of Gothicism in it (with very few exceptions) that I have not seen elsewhere"; and in an earlier letter he implies that its "extreme littleness" is its chief defect. But here, before for the moment leaving the subject, it is only fair to give the proprietor's own description of Strawberry Hill at this date, i. e., in June, 1753. After telling Mann that it is “so monastic” that he has “a little hall decked with long saints in lean arched windows and with taper columns, which we call the Paraclete, in memory of Eloisa’s cloister,”* he sends him a sketch of it, and goes on:—“The enclosed enchanted little landscape, then, is Strawberry Hill . . . This view of the castle is what I have just finished [it was a view of the south side, towards the north-east], and is the only side that will be at all regular. Directly before it is an open grove, through which you see a field, which is bounded by a serpentine wood of all kinds of trees, and flowering shrubs, and flowers. The lawn before the house is situated on the top of a small hill, from whence to the left you see the town and church of Twickenham encircling a turn of the river, that looks exactly like a sea-port in miniature. The opposite shore is a most delicious meadow, bounded by Richmond Hill, which loses itself in the noble woods of the park to the end of the prospect on the right, where is another turn of the river, and the suburbs of Kingston as luckily placed as Twickenham is on the left: and a natural terrace on the brow of my hill with meadows of my own down to the river, commands both extremities. Is not this a tolerable prospect? You must figure that all this is perpetually enlivened by a navigation of boats and barges, and by a road below my terrace, with coaches, post-chaises, waggons and horsemen constantly in motion, and the fields speckled with cows, horses, and sheep. Now you shall walk into the house. The bow window below leads into a little parlour hung with a stone-colour Gothic paper and Jackson's Venetian prints,* which I could never endure while they pretended, infamous as they are, to be after Titian, etc., but when I gave them this air of barbarous bas-reliefs, they succeeded to a miracle: it is impossible at first sight not to conclude that they contain the history of Attila or Tottila done about the very æra. From hence, under two gloomy arches, you come to the hall and staircase, which it is impossible to describe to

* In the Tribune (see Chap. viii) church looking at the tombs of was a drawing by Mr. Bentley, Abelard and Eloisa, and illustrating two lovers in a Pope’s lines:—

“ If ever chance two wand’ring lovers brings To Paraclete’s white walls and silver springs,” etc.

* The chiaroscuros of John Baptist Jackson, published at Venice in 1742. At this date he had returned to England, and was working in a paperhanging manufactory at Battersea.

you, as it is the most particular and chief beauty of the castle. Imagine the walls covered with (I call it paper, but it is really paper painted in perspective to represent) Gothic fretwork: the lightest Gothic balustrade to the staircase, adorned with antelopes (our supporters) bearing shields; lean windows fattened with rich saints in painted glass, and a vestibule open with three arches on the landing place; and niches full of trophies of old coats of mail, Indian shields made of rhinoceros's hides, broadswords, quivers, long bows, arrows and spears—all supposed to be taken by Sir Terry Robsart [an ancestor of Sir Robert Walpole] in the holy wars. But as none of this regards the inclosed drawing, I will pass to that. The room on the ground floor nearest to you is a bedchamber, hung with yellow paper and prints, framed in a new manner invented by Lord Cardigan; that is, with black and white borders printed. Over this is Mr. Chute's bedchamber, hung with red in the same manner. The bow window room one pair of stairs is not yet finished; but in the tower beyond is the charming closet where I am now writing to you. It is hung with green paper and water-colour pictures; has two windows; the one in the drawing looks to the garden, the other to the beautiful prospect; and the top of each glutted with the richest painted glass of the arms of England, crimson roses, and twenty other pieces of green, purple, and historic bits. I must tell you, by the way, that the castle, when finished, will have two-and-thirty windows enriched with painted glass. In this closet, which is Mr. Chute's College of Arms, are two presses of books of heraldry and antiquities, Madame Sévigné's Letters, and any French books that relate to her and her acquaintance. Out of this closet is the room where we always live, hung with a blue and white paper in stripes adorned with festoons, and a thousand plump chairs, couches, and luxurious settees covered with linen of the same pattern, and with a bow window commanding the prospect, and gloomed with limes that shade half each window, already darkened with painted glass in chiaroscuro, set in deep blue glass. Under this room is a cool little hall, where we generally dine, hung with paper to imitate Dutch tiles.

"I have described so much that you will begin to think that all the accounts I used to give you of the diminutiveness of our habitation were fabulous; but it is really incredible how small most of the rooms are. The only two good chambers I shall have are not yet built; they will be an eating-room and a library, each twenty by thirty, and the latter fifteen feet high. For the rest of the house, I could send it to you in this letter as easily as the drawing, only that I should have no where to live until the return of the post. The Chinese summer-house, which you may distinguish in the distant landscape, belongs to my Lord Radnor.* We pique ourselves upon nothing but simplicity, and have no carvings, gildings, paintings, inlayings, or tawdry businesses.”†

From this it will appear that in June, 1753, the library and refectory were not yet built, so that when he says in the printed description that they were new built in 1753, he must mean no more than that they had been begun. In a later letter of May, 1754, they were still un-

* Lord Radnor's whimsical house on the river, which Walpole nicknamed Mabland, came between Strawberry Hill and Pope's Villa, and is a conspicuous object in old views of Twickenham, notably in that, dated 1757, by Müntz, a Jersey artist, for some time domiciled at Strawberry Hill. It was in the garden of Radnor House that Pope first met Warburton.

† Walpole to Mann, 12 June, 1753.

finished. Meanwhile the house is gradually attracting more and more attention. George Montagu comes and is “in raptures and screams, and hoops, and hollas, and dances, and crosses himself a thousand times over.” The next visitor is “Nolkejumskoi”—otherwise the Duke of Cumberland, who inspects it much after the fashion of a gracious Gulliver surveying a castle in Lilliput. Afterwards, attracted by the reports of Lady Hervey and Mr. Bristow, arrives my Lord Bath, who is stirred into celebrating it to the tune of a song of Bubb Dodington on Mrs. Strawbridge, in stanzas of eight and six. His Lordship does not seem to have got further than two of these; but Walpole, not to leave so complimentary a tribute in the depressed condition of a fragment, modestly revised and completed it himself. The lines may fairly find a place here as an example of his lighter muse. The first and third verses are Lord Bath’s, the rest being obviously written in order to bring in “Nolkejumskoi” and some personal friends:—

“Some cry up Gunnersbury,
For Sion some declare;
And some say that with Chiswick-house
No villa can compare:

But ask the beaux of Middlesex,
Who know the country well,
If Strawb'ry-hill, if Strawb'ry-hill
Don't bear away the bell.

“ Some love to roll down Greenwich-hill
For this thing and for that;
And some prefer sweet Marble-hill,
Tho' sure 'tis somewhat flat:
Yet Marble-hill and Greenwich-hill
If Kitty Clive can tell,
From Strawb'ry-hill, from Strawb'ry-hill
Will never bear the bell.

“ Tho' Surrey boasts its Oatlands,
And Clermont kept so jim,
And some prefer sweet Southcote's,
'Tis but a dainty whim:
For ask the gallant Bristow,
Who does in taste excell,
If Strawb'ry-hill, if Strawb'ry-hill
Don't bear away the bell.

“ Since Denham sung of Cooper's,
There's scarce a hill around,
But what in song or ditty
Is turn'd to fairy-ground—
Ah, peace be with their memories!
I wish them wond'rous well,
But Strawb'ry-hill, but Strawb'ry-hill
Must bear away the bell.

“ Great William dwells at Windsor,
As Edward did of old,
And many a Gaul and many a Scot
Have found him full as bold.

On lofty hills like Windsor
Such heroes ought to dwell
Yet little folks like Strawb'ry-hill,
Like Strawb'ry-hill as well.” *

Cumberland Lodge, where, say the old guide-books, the hero of Culloden “reposed after victory,” still stands on the hill at the end of the Long Walk at Windsor; and at “Gunnersbury” lived the Princess Amelia. All the other houses referred to are in existence. “Sweet Marble-hill,” which, like Strawberry, was but recently put up for sale, had at this date for mistress the Countess of Suffolk (Mrs. Howard), for whom it had been built by her royal lover, George II; and Chiswick-house (now the Marquis of Bute’s), that famous structure of Kent’s which Lord Hervey said was “too small to inhabit and too large to hang to one’s watch chain,” was the residence of Richard, Earl of Burlington. Claremont “kept so jim” [neat], was the seat of the Duke of Newcastle at Esher; Oatlands, near Weybridge, belonged to the Duke of York, and Sion House, on the Thames, to the Duke of Northumberland. Walpole and his friends, it will be perceived, did not shrink from comparing small things with great. But perhaps the most notable circumstance about this glorification of Strawberry is that it should have originated with its reputed author. "Can there be," says Walpole, "an odder revolution of things, than that the printer of the Craftsman should live in a house of mine, and that the author of the Craftsman should write a panegyric on a house of mine?" The printer was Richard Franklyn, already mentioned as his tenant; and Lord Bath, if not the actual, was at least the putative, writer of most of the Craftsman's attacks upon Sir Robert Walpole. It is possible, however, that, as with the poem, part only of this honour really belonged to him.

* The version here followed is that given in A Description of the Villa, etc., 1774, pp. 117-19.

Strawberry Hill and its improvements have, however, carried us far from the date at which this chapter begins, and we must return to 1747. Happily the life of Walpole, though voluminously chronicled in his correspondence, is not so crowded with personal incident as to make a space of six years a serious matter to recover, especially when tested by the brief but still very detailed record in the Short Notes of what he held to be its conspicuous occurrences. In 1747-49 his zeal for his father's memory involved him in a good deal of party pamphleteering, and in 1749, he had what he styles “a remarkable quarrel” with the Speaker, of which one may say that, in these days, it would scarcely deserve its qualifying epithet, although it produced more paper war. “These things (he says himself) were only excusable by the lengths to which party had been carried against my father; or rather, were not excusable even then.” For this reason it is needless to dwell upon them here, as well as upon certain other papers in The Remembrancer for 1749, and a tract called Delenda est Oxonia, prompted by a heinous scheme, which was meditated by the Ministry, of attacking the liberties of that University by vesting in the Crown the nomination of the Chancellor. “This piece (he says), which I think one of my best, was seized at the printer’s and suppressed.” Then in November, 1749, comes something like a really “moving incident,”—he is robbed in Hyde Park. He was returning by moonlight to Arlington Street from Lord Holland’s when his coach was stopped by two of the most notorious of “Diana’s foresters,” Plunket and James M’Lean, and the adventure had all but a tragic termination.

M'Lean's pistol went off by accident, sending a bullet so nearly through Walpole's head that it grazed the skin under his eye, stunned him and passed through the roof of the chariot. His correspondence contains no more than a passing reference to this narrow escape, probably because it was amply reported (and expanded) in the public prints. But in a paper which he contributed to the World a year or two later, under guise of relating what had happened to one of his acquaintance, he reverts to this experience. "The whole affair (he says) was conducted with the greatest good-breeding on both sides. The robber, who had only taken a purse this way, because he had that morning been disappointed of marrying a great fortune, no sooner returned to his lodgings, than he sent the gentleman [i. e., Walpole himself] two letters of excuses, which, with less wit than the epistles of Voiture, had ten times more natural and easy politeness in their turn of expression. In the postscript he appointed a meeting at Tyburn at twelve at night, where the gentleman might purchase again any trifles he had lost; and my friend has been blamed for not accepting the rendezvous, as it seemed liable to be construed by ill-natured people into a doubt of the honour of a man, who had given him all the satisfaction in his power, for having unluckily been near shooting him through the head.”*

The “fashionable highwayman” (as Mr. M’Lean was called) was taken soon afterwards and hanged. “I am honourably mentioned in a Grub-street ballad (says Walpole) for not having contributed to his sentence,” and he goes on to say that there are as many prints and pamphlets about him as about that other sensation of 1750, the earthquake. M’Lean seems nevertheless to have been rather a pinchbeck Macheath; but for the moment, in default of larger lions, he was the rage. Several thousand people visited him after his condemnation in his cell at Newgate, where he is said to have fainted twice from the heat and pressure of the crowd. And his visitors were not all men. In a note to his Modern Fine Lady, Soame Jenyns says that some of the brightest eyes were in tears for him, and Walpole himself tells us that he excited the warmest commiseration in two of his own friends, Lady Caroline Petersham and Miss Ashe.*

* World, 19 Dec., 1754. (Works, 1798, i, 177-8.)

Miss Ashe, of whom we are told mysteriously by the commentators that she “was said to have been of very high parentage,” and Lady Caroline Petersham, a daughter of the Duke of Grafton, figure more pleasantly in another letter of Walpole, which gives a glimpse of some of those diversions with which he was wont to relieve the gothicising of his villa by the Thames. He relates it, he tells Montagu, in a phrase which proves how well he understood his own qualities, to show “the manners of the age, which are always as entertaining to a person fifty miles off as to one born an hundred and fifty years after the times.” We have not yet reached the later limit; but there is little doubt as to the interest of Walpole’s account of his visit in the month of June, 1750, to the famous gardens of Mr. Jonathan Tyers. He got a card, he says, from Lady Caroline to go with her to Vauxhall. He repairs accordingly to her house, and

* Another instance of M’Lean’s Gray’s Long Story, which was momentary vogue is given by written at the very time he was Cunningham. He is hitched into taken:—

“A sudden fit of ague shook him
He stood as mute as poor M’Lean.”

finds her “and the little Ashe, or the Pollard Ashe, as they call her,” having “just finished their last layer of red and looking as handsome as crimson can make them.” Others of the party are the Duke of Kingston, who had to wife the notorious Miss Chudleigh; Lord March of Thackeray’s Virginians; Harry Vane, soon to be Earl of Darlington; Mr. Whitehed; a “pretty Miss Beauclerc,” and a “foolish Miss Sparre.” As they sail up the Mall they encounter cross-grained Lord Petersham (my lady’s husband) shambling along after his wont,* and “as sulky as a ghost that nobody will speak to first.” He declines to accompany his wife and her friends, who, getting into the best order they can, march to their barge, which has a boat of French horns attending, and little Ashe sings. After parading up and down the river, they “debark” at Vauxhall, where at the outset they narrowly escape the excitement of a duel. For a certain Mrs. Lloyd of Spring Gardens, afterwards married to Lord Haddington, seeing Miss Beauclerc and her companion following Lady Petersham, says audibly, “Poor girls, I am sorry to see them in such bad company," a remark which "the foolish Miss Sparre" (she is but fifteen) for the fun of seeing a duel, endeavours to make Lord March resent. But my Lord, who is not only "very lively and agreeable," but also of a nice discretion, laughs her out of "this charming frolic with a great deal of humour." Next they pick up Lord Granby, arriving very drunk from "Jenny's Whim" at Chelsea, where he has left a mixed gathering of thirteen persons of quality playing at Brag. He is in the sentimental stage of his malady, and makes love to Miss Beauclerc and Miss Sparre alternately until the tide of champagne turns, and he remembers that he is married. "At last," says Walpole, and at this point the story may be surrendered to him entirely — "we assembled in our booth, Lady Caroline in the front, with the vizor of her hat erect, and looking gloriously jolly and handsome. She had fetched my brother Orford from the next box, where he was enjoying himself with his petite partie, to help us to mince chickens. We minced seven chickens into a china dish, which Lady Caroline stewed over a lamp with three pats of butter and a flagon of water, stirring, and rattling and laughing, and we every minute expecting to have the dish fly about our ears. She had brought Betty, the fruit girl,* with hampers of strawberries and cherries from Rogers's, and made her wait upon us, and then made her sup by us at a little table. The conversation was no less lively than the whole transaction. There was a Mr. O'Brien arrived from Ireland, who would get the Duchess of Manchester from Mr. Hussey, if she were still at liberty. I took up the biggest hautboy in the dish, and said to Lady Caroline, 'Madam, Miss Ashe desires you would eat this O'Brien strawberry'; she replied immediately, 'I won't, you hussey.' You may imagine the laugh this reply occasioned. After the tempest was a little calmed, the Pollard said, 'Now, how anybody would spoil this story that was to repeat it, and say, I won't, you jade.' In short the whole air of our party was sufficient, as you will easily imagine, to take up the whole attention of the garden; so much so, that from eleven o'clock till half an hour after one we had the whole concourse round our booth: at last, they came into the little gardens of each booth on the sides of ours, till Harry Vane took up a bumper, and drank their healths and was proceeding to treat them with still greater freedom. It was three o'clock before we got home." He adds a characteristic touch to explain Lord Granby's eccentricities. He had lost eight hundred pounds to the Prince of Wales at Kew the night before, and this had "a little ruffled" His Lordship's temper.*

* He was popularly known as “Peter Shamble.” He afterwards became Earl of Harrington.

* Betty Neale, here referred to, was a well-known character in St. James's Street, where, for many years, she kept a fruit shop. She survived until 1797, when her death, at the age of 67, is recorded in the Gentleman's Magazine.

Early in 1753, Edward Moore, the author of some Fables for the Female Sex, once popular enough to figure, between Thomson and Prior, in Goldsmith's Beauties of English Poesy, established the periodical paper called The World, which to quote a latter-day definition, might fairly claim to be "written by gentlemen for gentlemen." Soame Jenyns, Walpole's Twickenham neighbour, Cambridge of the Scribleriad; Hamilton Boyle, Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, and Lord Chesterfield were all contributors. That Walpole should also attempt this "bow of Ulysses, in which it was the fashion for men of rank and genius to try their strength," goes without saying. His gifts were exactly suited to the work, and his contributions to Moore's pages are by no means its worst. His first essay was a bright little piece of persiflage upon what he calls the return of nature, and proceeds to illustrate by the introduction of "real water" on the stage, by Kent's landscape gardening, and by the fauna and flora of the dessert table. A second paper was devoted to that extraordinary adventurer, Baron Neuhoff, otherwise Theodore, King of Corsica, who, with his realm for his only assets, was at this time a tenant of the King's Bench prison. Walpole, with genuine kindness, proposed a subscription for this bankrupt Belisarius, and a sum of fifty pounds was collected. This, however, proved so much below the expectations of His Corsican Majesty, that he actually had the effrontery to threaten Dodsley, the printer of the paper, with a prosecution for using his name unjustifiably. "I have done with countenancing Kings," wrote Walpole to Mann.*

* Walpole to Montagu, 23 June, 1750.

* Nevertheless, when this "Roi en Exil" shortly afterwards died, Walpole erected a stone in St. Ann's Church, Soho, to his memory, with the following inscription :

" Near this place is interred Theodore, King of Corsica;
Who died in this parish, Dec. 11, 1756,

Others of his World papers are on the Glastonbury Thorn; on Letter-Writing, a subject of which he might claim to speak with authority; on old women as objects of passion, and on politeness, wherein occurs the already quoted anecdote of M'Lean the highwayman. The light hand and lighter humour made him an almost ideal contributor to Moore's pages, and it is not surprising to find that such judges as Lady Mary approved his performances, or that he himself regarded them with a complacency which peeps out now and again in his letters. "I met Mrs. Clive two nights ago," he says, "and told her I had been in the meadows, but would walk no more there, for there was all the world. 'Well,' says she, 'and don't you like the World? I hear it was very clever last Thursday.'" "Last Thursday" had appeared Walpole's paper on elderly "flames."

Immediately after leaving the King's-s-Bench-Prison
By the benefit of the Act of Insolvency;
In consequence of which he registered
His Kingdom of Corsica
For the use of his Creditors.

"The Grave, great teacher, to a level brings,
Heroes and beggars, galley-slaves and Kings.
But Theodore this moral learn'd, ere dead;
Fate pour'd its lessons on his living head,
Bestow'd a kingdom, and denied him bread."

During the period covered by this chapter the reintegratio amoris with Gray, to which reference has been made, became confirmed. Whether the attachment was ever quite on the old basis, may be doubted. Gray always poses a little as the aggrieved person who could not speak first, and to whom unmistakable overtures must be made by the other side. He as yet “neither repents nor rejoices over much, but is pleased”—he tells Chute in 1750. On the other hand, Walpole, though he appears to have proffered his palm branch with very genuine geniality and desire to let by-gones be by-gones, was not above very candid criticism of his recovered friend. “I agree with you most absolutely in your opinion about Gray,” he writes to Montagu in September, 1748; “he is the worst company in the world. From a melancholy turn, from living reclusely, and from a little too much dignity, he never converses easily; all his words are measured and chosen, and formed into sentences; his writings are admirable; he himself is not agreeable.” Meantime, however, the revived connection went on pleasantly. Gray made flying visits to Strawberry and Arlington Street, and prattled to Walpole from Pembroke between whiles.

And certainly, in a measure, it is to Walpole that we owe Gray. It was Walpole who induced Gray to allow Dodsley to print in 1747, as an attenuated folio pamphlet, the Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College; and it was the tragic end of one of Walpole's favourite cats in a china bowl of gold-fish (of which by the way there was a large pond called Po-yang at Strawberry) which prompted the delightful occasional verses by Gray beginning :—

“ ’Twas on a lofty vase’s side,
Where China’s gayest art had dy’d
 The azure flow’rs, that blow;
Demurest of the tabby kind,
The pensive Selima reclin’d, Gaz’d on the lake below,”—

a stanza which, with a trifling alteration of tenses, long served as a label for the “lofty vase” in the Strawberry Hill collection. To Walpole’s officious circulation of the famous Elegy written in a Country Church Yard in manuscript must indirectly be attributed its publication by Dodsley in February, 1751, as well as the composition of that typical piece of vers de société, the Long Story, which originated in the interest in the recluse poet of Stoke Poges with which Walpole's well-meaning (if unwelcome) advocacy had inspired Lady Cobham and some other lion-hunters of the neighbourhood. But his chief enterprise in connection with his friend's productions was the edition of them put forth in March, 1753, with illustrations by Richard Bentley, the youngest child of the famous Master of Trinity. Bentley possessed considerable attainments as an amateur artist, and as a scholar and connoisseur had just that virtuoso finesse of manner which was most attractive to Walpole, whose guest and counsellor he frequently became during the progress of the Strawberry improvements. Out of this connection which, in its hot fits, was of the most confidential character, grew the suggestion that Bentley should make, at Walpole's expense, a series of designs for Gray's poems. These, which are still in existence,* were engraved with great delicacy by two of the best engravers of that time, Müller and Charles Grignion; and the Poemata-Gray-Bentleiana, as Walpole christened them, became and remains one of the most remarkable of

* A copy of the poems, "illustrated with the original designs of Mr. Richard Bentley, . . . and also with Mr. Gray's original sketch of Stoke House, from which Mr. Bentley made his finished pen drawing," was sold at the Strawberry Hill sale of 1842 for £8 8s.

the illustrated books of the last century. Gray, as may be imagined, could scarcely oppose the compliment; and he seems to have interested himself minutely in its accomplishment, rewarding the artist by some commendatory verses, in which, he certainly does not deny himself, to use a phrase of Mr. Swinburne, “the noble pleasure of praising.”* But even over this book the sensitive ligament that linked him to Walpole was perilously strained. Without consulting him, Walpole had his portrait engraved as a frontispiece, a step which instantly drew from Gray a wail of nervous expostulation so unmistakably heartfelt that it was impossible to proceed with the plate. Thus it came about that Designs by Mr. R. Bentley for Six Poems by Mr. T. Gray made its appearance without the portrait of the poet.

Bentley’s ingenious son was not the only person whom the decoration of Strawberry pressed into the service of its owner. Selwyn, the wit, George James (or “Gilly”) Williams, a

* The verses include this magnificent stanza:—

“But not to one in this benighted age
Is that diviner inspiration giv’n,
That burns in Shakespeare’s or in Milton’s page,
The pomp and prodigality of heaven.”

connoisseur of considerable ability, and Richard Lord Edgcumbe occasionally sat as a committee of taste, a function commemorated by Reynolds in a conversation piece which afterwards formed one of the chief ornaments of the Refectory; and upon Bentley's recommendation Walpole invited from Jersey a humbler guest in the person of a German artist named Müntz—"an inoffensive, good creature, who would rather ponder over a foreign gazette than a palette," but whose services kept him domiciled for some time at the Gothic castle. Müntz executed many views of the neighbourhood, which are still, like that of Twickenham already referred to, preserved in contemporary engravings. And besides the persons whom Walpole drew into his immediate circle, the "village," as he called it, was growing steadily in public favour. "Mr. Müntz"—writes Walpole in July, 1755—"says we have more coaches than there are in half France. Mrs. Pritchard has bought Ragman's Castle, for which my Lord Litchfield could not agree. We shall be as celebrated as Baiæ or Tivoli; and if we have not as sonorous names as they boast, we have very famous people: Clive and Pritchard, actresses; Scott and Hudson, painters; my Lady Suffolk, famous in her time; Mr. H[ickey] the impudent lawyer that Tom Hervey wrote against; Whitehead, the poet, and Cambridge the everything.” Cambridge has already been referred to as a contributor to the World, and the Whitehead was the one mentioned in Churchill’s stinging couplet:—

“ May I (can worse disgrace on manhood fall?)
Be born a Whitehead, and baptised a Paul,”— who then lived on Twickenham Common. Scott was Samuel Scott the “English Canaletti” and one of the heroes of Hogarth’s “Five Days’ Tour”; Hudson, Sir Joshua’s master, who had a house on the river next Lord Radnor’s. But Walpole’s best allies were two of the other sex. One was Lady Suffolk, the whilom friend (as Mrs. Howard) of Pope and Swift and Gay, whose home at Marble Hill is celebrated in the Walpole-cum-Pulteney poem; the other was red-faced Mrs. Clive, who occupied a house known familiarly as “Clive-den” and officially as Little Strawberry. She had not yet retired from the stage. Lady Suffolk’s stories of the Georgian Court and its scandals, and Mrs. Clive’s anecdotes of the greenroom, and of their common neighbour at Hampton, the great “Roscius” himself (with whom she was always at war), must have furnished Walpole with an inexhaustible supply of just the particular description of gossip which he most appreciated.

EPPERSON MFG. CO.

CHAPTER VI.

Gleanings from the “Short Notes” : “Letter from Xo Ho”; the Strawberry Hill Press; Robinson the Printer; Gray’s “Odes”; other works; “Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors”; “Anecdotes of Painting”; humours of the Press; “The Parish Register of Twickenham”; Lady Fanny Shirley, Fielding; “The Castle of Otranto.”

VI.

IN order to take up the little-variegated thread of Walpole's life, we must again resort to the Short Notes, in which, as already stated, he has recorded what he considered to be its most important occurrences. In 1754, he had been chosen member, in the new Parliament of that year, for Castle Rising in Norfolk. In March, 1755, he says, he was very ill-used by his nephew Lord Orford [i. e., the son of his eldest brother Robert] upon a contested election in the House of Commons, “on which I wrote him a long letter, with an account of my own conduct in politics.” This letter does not seem to have been preserved, and it is difficult to conceive that its theme could have involved very lengthy explanations. In February, 1757, he vacated his Castle Rising seat for that of Lynn, and about the same time, he tells us, used his best endeavours, although in vain, to save the unfortunate Admiral Byng, who was executed pour encourager les autres in the following March. But with the exception of his erection of a tablet to Theodore of Corsica, and the dismissal in 1759 of Mr. Müntz, with whom his connection seems to have been exceptionally prolonged, his record for the next decade, or until the publication of the Castle of Otranto, is almost exclusively literary, and deals with the establishment of his private printing press at Strawberry Hill, his publication thereat of Gray’s Odes and other works, his Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, his Anecdotes of Painting and his above-mentioned romance. This accidental absorption of his chronicle by literary production will serve as a sufficient reason for devoting this chapter to those efforts of his pen which, from the outset, were destined to the permanence of type.

Already, as far back as March, 1751, he had begun the work afterwards known as the Mémoires of the last Ten Years of the Reign of George II, to the progress of which there are scattered references in the Short Notes. He had intended at first to confine them to the history of one year, but they grew under his hand. His first definite literary effort in 1757, however, was the clever little squib, after the model of Montesquieu's Lettres Persanes, entitled A Letter from Xo Ho, a Chinese Philosopher at London, to his friend Lien Chi, at Peking, in which he ingeniously satirises the "late political revolutions" and the inconstant disposition of the English nation, not forgetting to fire off a few sarcasms à-propos of the Byng tragedy. The piece, he tells Mann, was written "in an hour and a half" (there is always a little of Oronte's Je n'ai demeuré qu'un quart d'heure à le faire about Walpole's literary efforts), was sent to press next day, and ran through five editions in a fortnight.* Mrs. Clive was of opinion

* It may be observed that when Walpole's letter was published, it was briefly noticed in the Monthly

Review, where at this very date Oliver Goldsmith was working as the hind of Griffiths and his wife.

that the rash satirist would be sent to the Tower, but he himself regarded it as “perhaps the only political paper ever written, in which no man of any party could dislike or deny a single fact”; and Henry Fox, to whom he sent a copy, may be held to confirm this view, since his only objection seems to have been that it did not hit some of the other side a little harder. It would be difficult now without long notes to make it intelligible to modern readers, but the ensuing outburst of the Chinese philosopher respecting the mutabilities of the English climate has the merit of enduring applicability. “The English have no sun, no summer as we have, at least their sun does not scorch like ours. They content themselves with names: at a certain time of the year they leave their capital, and that makes summer; they go out of the city, and that makes the country. Their monarch, when he goes into the country, passes in his calash* by a row of high trees, goes along a

It is also notable that the name of Xo Ho’s correspondent, Lien Chi, seems almost a foreshadowing of Goldsmith’s Lien Chi Altangi. Can

it be possible that Walpole supplied Goldsmith with his first idea of the Citizen of the World?

* A four-wheeled carriage with a movable hood. Ep. Prior’s Down Hall: — “Then answer’d Squire Morley; Pray get a calash, That in summer may burn, and in winter may splash,” etc.

gravel walk, crosses one of the chief streets, is driven by the side of a canal between two rows of lamps, at the end of which he has a small house, and then he is supposed to be in the country. I saw this ceremony yesterday: as soon as he was gone the men put on under vestments of white linen, and the women left off those vast draperies, which they call hoops, and which I have described to thee; and then all the men and all the women said it was hot. If thou wilt believe me I am now [in May] writing to thee before a fire.”*

In the following June Walpole had betaken himself to the place he “loved best of all,” and was amusing himself at Strawberry with his pen. The next work which he records is the publication of a Catalogue of the Collection of Pictures of [i. e., belonging to] Charles the First, for which he prepared “a little introduction.” This, and the subsequent “prefaces or advertisements” to the Catalogues of the Collections of James the Second, and the Duke of Buckingham, are to be found in Vol. i of his works. But the great event of 1757 is the establishment of the Officina Arbuteana or private printing press of Strawberry Hill. “Elzevir, Aldus, and Stephens,” he tells Chute in July, “are the freshest personages in his memory,” and he jestingly threatens to assume as his motto (with a slight variation) Pope’s couplet :

* Works, 1798, i, 208.

“Some have at first for wits, then poets pass’d ; Turn’d printers next, and proved plain fools at last.”

“I am turned printer,” he writes somewhat later, “and have converted a little cottage here into a printing-office. My abbey is a perfect college or academy. I keep a painter [Müntz] in the house, and a printer—not to mention Mr. Bentley, who is an academy himself.” William Robinson, the printer, an Irishman with noticeable eyes which Garrick envied (“they are more Richard the Third’s than Garrick’s own,” says Walpole), must have been a rather original personage, to judge by a copy of one of his letters which his patron encloses to Mann. He says he found it in a drawer where it had evidently been placed to attract his attention. After telling his correspondent in bad blank verse that he dates from the “shady bowers, nodding groves and amaranthine shades (?)” of Twickenham—“Richmond’s near neighbour, where great

George the King resides”—Robinson proceeds to describe his employer as “the Hon. Horatio Walpole, son to the late great Sir Robert Walpole, who is very studious, and an admirer of all the liberal arts and sciences; amongst the rest he admires printing. He has fitted out a complete printing-house at this his country seat, and has done me the favour to make me sole manager and operator (there being no one but myself). All men of genius resorts his house, courts his company and admires his understanding—what with his own and their writings, I believe I shall be pretty well employed. I have pleased him, and I hope to continue so to do.” Then after a reference to the extreme heat—a heat by which fowls and quarters of lamb have been roasted in the London Artillery grounds “by the help of glasses”—so capricious was the climate over which Walpole had made merry in May,—he proceeds to describe Strawberry. “The place I am now in is all my comfort from the heat—the situation of it is close to the Thames, and is Richmond Gardens (if you were ever in them) in miniature, surrounded by bowers, groves, cascades and ponds, and on a rising ground not very common in this part of the country—the building elegant, and the furniture of a peculiar taste, magnificent and superb." At this date poor Robinson seems to have been delighted with the place, and the fastidious master whom he hoped "to continue to please." But Walpole was nothing if not mutable, and two years later he had found out that Robinson of the remarkable eyes was "a foolish Irishman, who took himself for a genius," and they parted, with the result that the Officina Arbuteana was temporarily at a standstill.

For the moment, however, things went smoothly enough. It had been intended that the maiden effort of the Strawberry types should have been a translation by Bentley of Paul Hentzner's curious account of England in 1598. But Walpole suddenly became aware that Gray had put the penultimate, if not the final, touches to his painfully-elaborated Pindaric Odes, the Bard and the Progress of Poesy, and he pounced upon them forthwith—Gray as usual, half ex-postulating, half overborne. "You will dislike this as much as I do"—he writes to Mason—"but there is no help." "You understand," he adds, with the air of one resigning himself to the inevitable, "it is he that prints them, not for me, but for Dodsley." However, he persisted in refusing Walpole's not entirely unreasonable request for notes. "If a thing cannot be understood without them," he said characteristically, "it had better not be understood at all." Consequently, while describing them as "Greek, Pindaric, sublime," Walpole confesses under his breath that they are a little obscure. Dodsley paid Gray forty guineas for the book, which was a large, thin quarto entitled Odes by Mr. Gray; Printed at Strawberry Hill for R. and J. Dodsley in Pall Mall. It was published in August, and the price was a shilling. On the title-page was a dusky vignette of the Gothic castle at Twickenham. From a letter of Walpole to Lyttelton it would seem that his apprehensions as to the poems being "understood of the people" proved well-founded. "They [the age] have cast their eyes over them, found them obscure, and looked no further, yet perhaps no compositions ever had more sublime beauties than are in each,"—and he goes on to criticise them minutely in a fashion which shows that his own appreciation of them was by no means unqualified. But Warburton, and Garrick, and the "word-picker" Hurd were enthusiastic. Lyttelton and Shenstone followed more moderately. Upon the whole, the success of the first venture was encouraging, and the share in it of "Elzevir Horace," as Conway called his friend, was not forgotten.

Gray's Odes were succeeded by Hentzner's Travels, or, to speak more accurately, by that portion of Hentzner's Travels which refers to England. In England Hentzner was little known, and the 220 copies which Walpole printed in October, 1757, were prefaced by an Advertisement from his pen and a dedication to the Society of Antiquaries, of which he was a member. After this came, in 1758, his Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors; a collection of Fugitive Pieces (which included his essays in the World), dedicated to Conway;* and seven hundred copies of Lord Whitworth's Account of Russia. Then followed a book by Joseph Spence, the Parallel of Magliabecchi and Mr. [Robert] Hill, a learned tailor of Buckingham, the object of which was to benefit Hill, an end which must have been attained, as six out of seven

* These, though printed in 1758, were not circulated until 1759. See, at end,—“Appendix of Books printed at the Strawberry Hill Press,” which contains full details of all these publications.

hundred copies were sold in a fortnight, and the book was reprinted in London. Bentley's Lucan, a quarto of 500 copies, succeeded Spence, and then came three other quartos of Anecdotes of Painting by Walpole himself. The only other notable products of the press during this period are the Autobiography of Lord Herbert of Cherbury, 4^{to}, 1764, and 100 copies of the Poems of Lady Temple. This, however, is a very fair record for seven years' work, when it is remembered that the Strawberry Hill staff never exceeded a man and a boy. As already stated, the first printer, Robinson, was dismissed in 1759. His place, after a short interval of "occasional hands," was taken by Thomas Kirgate, whose name thenceforth appears on all the Twickenham issues, with which it is indissolubly connected. Kirgate continued, with greater good fortune than his predecessors, to perform his duties until Walpole's death.

In the above list there are two books which, in these pages, deserve a more extended notice than the rest. The Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors had at least the merit of novelty, and certainly a better reason for its existence than some of the works to which its author refers in his preface. Even the works of Pulteney, Earl of Bath, and the English rondeaus of Charles of Orleans are more worthy of a chronicler than the lives of physicians who had been poets, of men who had died laughing, or of Frenchmen who had studied Hebrew. Walpole took considerable pains in obtaining information, and his book was exceedingly well received — indeed, far more favourably than he had any reason to expect. A second edition, which was not printed at Strawberry Hill, speedily followed the first, with no diminution of its prosperity. For a book which made no pretensions to symmetry, which is often meagre where it might have been expected to be full, and is every where prejudiced by a sort of fine-gentleman disdain of exactitude — this was certainly as much as he could anticipate. But he seems to have been more than usually sensitive to criticism, and some of the amplest of his Short Notes are devoted to the discussion of the adverse opinions which were expressed. From these we learn that he was abused by the Critical Review for disliking the Stuarts, and by the Monthly for liking his father. Further, that he found an apologist in

Dr. Hill (of the Inspector) whose gross adulation was worse than abuse; and lastly, that he was seriously attacked in a Pamphlet of Remarks on Mr. Walpole's "Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors" by a certain Carter, concerning whose antecedents his irritation goes on to bring together all the scandals he can collect. As the Short Notes were written long after the events, it shows how his soreness against his critics continued. What it was when still fresh may be gathered from the following quotation from a letter to the Rev^d. Henry Zouch, to whom he was indebted for many new facts and corrections, especially in the second edition, and who afterwards helped him in the Anecdotes of Painting:—"I am sick of the character of author; I am sick of the consequences of it; I am weary of seeing my name in the newspapers; I am tired with reading foolish criticisms on me, and as foolish defences of me; and I trust my friends will be so good as to let the last abuse of me pass unanswered. It is called "Remarks" on my Catalogue, asperses the Revolution more than it does my book, and, in one word, is written by a nonjuring preacher, who was a dog-doctor. Of me, he knows so little that he thinks to punish me by abusing King William!" *

In a letter of a few months earlier to the same correspondent, he refers to another work upon which, in despite of the sentence just quoted, he continued to employ himself. "Last summer," — he says,— "I bought of Vertue's widow forty volumes of his MS. collections relating to English painters, sculptors, gravers and architects. He had actually begun their lives: unluckily he had not gone far, and could not write grammar. I propose to digest and complete this work." † The purchases referred to had been made subsequent to the engraver's death in 1756, when his widow applied to Walpole, as a connoisseur, to become the purchaser of her husband's voluminous notes and memoranda with respect to art and artists in England. He also acquired at Vertue's sale in May, 1757, a number of copies from Holbein and two or three other pictures. He seems to have almost immediately set about arranging and digesting this unwieldy and chaotic heap of material, ‡ much of which besides

* Walpole to Zouch, 14 May, 1759.

† Walpole to Zouch, 12 January, 1759.

‡ "Mr. Vertue's Manuscripts, in 28 vols"—were sold at the Sale of Rare Prints and Illustrated Works from the Strawberry Hill being illiterate, was also illegible. More than once his patience gave way under the drudgery; but he nevertheless persevered in a way that shows a tenacity of purpose foreign in this case at all events to his assumption of dilettante indifference. His progress is thus chronicled. He began in January, 1760, and finished the first volume on 14 August. The second volume was begun in September and completed on the 23rd October. On the 4th January in the following year he set about the third volume, but laid it aside after the first day, not resuming it until the end of June. In August, however, he finished it. Two volumes were published in 1762, and a third, which is dated 1763, in 1764. As usual, he affected more or less to undervalue his own share in the work; but he very justly laid stress in his "Preface" upon the fact that he was little more than the arranger of data not collected by his own exertions. "I would not," he said to Zouch, "have the materials of forty years, which was Vertue's case, depreciated in compliment to the work of four months, which is almost my whole merit." Here, again, the tone is a little Collection on Tuesday, 21 June, in the Short Notes that he paid 1842, for £26 10s. Walpole says £100.

in the Oronte manner; but, upon the main point, the interest of the work, his friends did not share his apprehensions, and Gray especially was “violent about it.” Nor did the public show themselves less appreciative, for there was so much that was new in the dead engraver’s memoranda, and so much which was the result of visits to private galleries and obscure sources, that the work could scarcely have failed of readers even if the style had been hopelessly corrupt, which, under Walpole’s revision, it certainly was not. In 1762, he began a Catalogue of Engravers, which he finished in about six weeks as a supplementary volume, and in 1765, still from the Strawberry Press, he issued a second edition of the whole.*

After the appearance of the second edition of the Anecdotes of Painting, a silence fell upon the Officina Arbuteana for three years, during the earlier part of which time Walpole was at Paris, as will be narrated in the next chapter. His press, as may be guessed, was one of the sights of his Gothic castle, and there are

* The Anecdotes of Painting was enlarged by the Revd. James Dallaway in 1826–8, and again revised, with additional notes, by several anecdotes showing how his ingenious fancy made it the vehicle of adroit compliment. Once, not long after it had been established, my Lady Rochford, Lady Townshend (the witty Ethelreda or Audrey Harrison),* and Sir John Bland's sister were carried after dinner into the printing room to see Mr. Robinson at work. He immediately struck off some verse which was already set up in type, and presented it to Lady Townshend:—

Ralph N. Wornum in 1839. This last in three volumes, 8vo, is the accepted edition.

THE PRESS SPEAKS.

From me wits and poets their glory obtain ;
Without me their wit and their verses were vain.
Stop, Townshend, and let me but paint † what you say ;
You, the fame I on others bestow, will repay.

His visitors then asked, as he had anticipated, to see the actual process of setting up the type, and Walpole ostensibly gave the printer four lines out of The Fair Penitent. But, by what would now be styled a clever feat of prestidigitation, the forewarned Robinson struck off the following, this time to Lady Rochford:—

* She was married to Charles, 3rd Viscount Townshend, in 1723, and was the mother of Charles Townshend the statesman. She died in 1788. There was an enamel of her by Zincke after Vanloo in the Tribune at Strawberry Hill.

† Query—"print."

THE PRESS SPEAKS.

In vain from your properest name you have flown,
And exchanged lovely Cupid's for Hymen's dull throne;
By my art shall your beauties be constantly sung
And in spite of yourself you shall ever be young.

Lady Rochford's maiden name, it should be explained, was “Young.” Such were what their inventor calls les amusements des eaux de Straberry in the month of August and the year of grace 1757.

Besides the major efforts already mentioned, the Short Notes contain references to various occasional pieces which Walpole composed, some of which he printed, and some others of which have been published since his death. One of these, The Magpie and her Brood, was a pleasant little fable from the French of Bona-venture des Periers, rhymed for Miss Hotham, the youthful niece of his neighbour Lady Suffolk; another a Dialogue between two Great Ladies. In 1761, he wrote a little piece called The Garland, a poem on the King, which first saw the light in the Quarterly for 1852. Besides these were several epigrams, mock sermons, and occasional verses. But perhaps the most interesting of his productions in this kind are the verses which he wrote in August, 1759, called The Parish Register of Twickenham. It is a metrical list of all the remarkable persons who ever lived there, for which reason a portion of it may find a place here: —

“ Where silver Thames round Twit’nam meads His winding current sweetly leads;
Twit’nam, the Muses’ fav’rite seat,
Twit’nam, the Graces’ lov’d retreat;
There polish’d Essex wont to sport,
The pride and victim of a court!
There Bacon tuned the grateful lyre
To soothe Eliza’s haughty ire;
— Ah! happy had no meaner strain
Than friendship’s dashed his mighty vein!
Twit’nam, where Hyde, majestic sage,
Retir’d from frolic’s frantic stage,
While his vast soul was hung on tenters
To mend the world, and vex dissenters;
Twit’nam, where frolic Wharton revel’d,
Where Montague with lock dishevel’d (Conflict of dirt and warmth divine), Invok’d — and scandalis’d the Nine:
Where Pope in moral music spoke
To th’ anguish’d soul of Bolingbroke,
And whisper’d, how true genius errs,
Preferring joys that power confers;
Bliss, never to great minds arising
From ruling worlds, but from despising:
Where Fielding met his bunter Muse,
And, as they quaff’d the fiery juice,

Droll Nature stamp'd each lucky hit
With inimaginable wit:
Where Suffolk sought the peaceful scene,
Resigning Richmond to the Queen,
And all the glory, all the teasing,
Of pleasing one, not worth the pleasing:
Where Fanny, ‘ever blooming fair,’ Ejaculates the graceful pray’r,
And, scap’d from sense, with nonsense smit,
For Whitfield’s cant leaves Stanhope’s wit:
Amid this choir of sounding names
Of statesmen, bards and beauteous dames,
Shall the last trifler of the throng Enroll his own such names among?
— Oh! no — Enough if I consign
To lasting types their notes divine:
Enough, if Strawberry’s humble-hill
The title-page of fame shall fill.”*

In 1784, Walpole added a few lines to celebrate a new resident and a new favourite, Lady Di Beauclerk, the widow of Johnson’s famous friend.† Most of the other names which occur in the Twickenham Register are easily identified. “Fanny, ‘ever blooming fair’” was the beautiful Lady Fanny Shirley of Philips’ ballad, aunt of that fourth Earl Ferrers, who in 1760 was hung at Tyburn for murdering his steward. Miss Hawkins remembered her as residing at a house now called Heath Lane Lodge with her mother, "a very ancient Countess Ferrers," widow of the first Earl. Henry Fielding, to whom Walpole gives a quatrain, of which the second couplet must excuse the insolence of the first, had for some time lodgings in Back Lane, whence was baptised in February, 1748, the elder of his sons by his second wife, the William Fielding, who, like his father, became a Westminster magistrate. It is more likely that Tom Jones was written at Twickenham than at any of the dozen other places for which that honour is claimed, since the author quitted Twickenham late in 1748, and his great novel was published early in the following year. Walpole had only been resident for a short time when Fielding left, but even had this been otherwise, it is not likely that, between the master of the Comic Epos (who was also Lady Mary's cousin!) and the dilettante proprietor of Strawberry, there could ever have been much cordiality. Indeed, for some of the robuster spirits of his age Walpole shows an extraordinary distaste, which with him generally implies unsympathetic, if not absolutely illiberal, comment. Almost the only important anecdote of Fielding in his correspondence is one of which the distorting bias is demonstrable,* and to Fielding's contemporary Hogarth, although as a connoisseur he was shrewd enough to collect his works, he scarcely ever refers but to place him in a ridiculous aspect, a course which contrasts curiously with the extravagant praise he gives to Bentley, Bunbury, Lady Beauclerk, and some other of the very minor artistic lights in his own circle.

* Works, 1798, Vol. iv, pp. 382–3. † See Chapter ix.

It is, however, possible to write too long an excursus upon the Twickenham Parish Register, and the last paragraphs of this chapter belong of right to another and more important work, The Castle of Otranto. According to the Short Notes, this "Gothic romance" was begun in June, 1764, and finished on the 6th August following. From another account we learn that it occupied eight nights of this period from ten o'clock at night until two in the morning, to the accompaniment of coffee. In a letter to Cole, the Cambridge antiquary, with whom Walpole commenced to correspond in 1762, he gives some further particulars, which, because they have been so often quoted, can scarcely be omitted here:—"Shall I even confess to you, what was the origin of this romance! I waked one morning, in the beginning of last June, from a dream, of which, all I could recover was, that I had thought myself in an ancient castle (a very natural dream for a head filled like mine with Gothic story), and that on the uppermost bannister of a great staircase I saw a gigantic hand in armour. In the evening I sat down, and began to write, without knowing in the least what I intended to say or relate. The work grew on my hands and I grew fond of it — add that I was very glad to think of anything, rather than politics. In short, I was so engrossed by my tale, which I completed in less than two months, that one evening, I wrote from the time I had drunk my tea, about six o'clock, till half an hour after one in the morning, when my hand and fingers were so weary, that I could not hold the pen to finish the sentence, but left Matilda and Isabella talking, in the middle of a paragraph."*

* Cf. Chapter vi of Fielding, Men of Letters series, 2nd edition, by the present writer, in the 1889.

The work of which the origin is thus described was published in a limited edition on the 24th December, 1764, with the title of The Castle of Otranto, a Story, translated by William

* Letter to Cole, 9 Mar., 1765.

Marshal, Gent. from the original Italian of Onuphrio Muralto, Canon of the Church of St. Nicholas at Otranto. The name of the alleged Italian author is sometimes described as an anagram for Horace Walpole—a misconception which is easily demonstrated by counting the letters. The book was printed not for Walpole, but for Lownds of Fleet Street, and it was prefaced by an introduction in which the author described and criticised the supposed original, which he declared to be a black-letter printed at Naples in 1529. Its success was considerable. It seems at first to have excited no suspicion as to its authenticity, and it is not clear that even Gray, to whom a copy was sent immediately after publication, was in the secret. “I have received the Castle of Otranto,”—he says,—“and return you my thanks for it. It engages our attention here [at Cambridge], makes some of us cry a little, and all in general afraid to go to bed o’ nights.” In the second edition, which followed in April, 1765, Walpole dropped the mask, disclosing his authorship in a second preface of great ability, which, among other things, contains a vindication of Shakespeare’s mingling of comedy and tragedy against the strictures of Voltaire — a piece of temerity which some of his French friends feared might prejudice him with that formidable critic. But what is even more interesting is his own account of what he had attempted. He had endeavoured to blend ancient and modern romance — to employ the old supernatural agencies of Scudéri and La Calprenède as the background to the adventures of personages modelled as closely upon ordinary life as the personages of Tom Jones. These are not his actual illustrations, but they express his meaning. “The actions, sentiments, conversations, of the heroes and heroines of ancient days were as unnatural as the machines employed to set them in motion.” He would make his heroes and heroines natural in all these things, only borrowing from the older school some of that imagination, invention, and fancy which, in the literal reproduction of life, he thought too much neglected.

His idea was novel, and the moment a favourable one for its development. Fluently and lucidly written, the Castle of Otranto set a fashion in literature. But, like many other works produced under similar conditions, it had its day. To the pioneer of a movement which has exhausted itself, there comes often what is almost worse than oblivion — discredit and neglect. A generation like the present, for whom fiction has unravelled so many intricate combinations, and whose Gothicism and Mediævalism is better instructed than Walpole's, no longer feels its soul harrowed up in the same way as did his hushed and awe-struck readers of the days of the third George. To the critic the book is interesting as the first of a school of romances which had the honour of influencing even the mighty “Wizard of the North,” who, no doubt in gratitude, wrote for Ballantyne's Novelist's Library a most appreciative study of the story. But we doubt if that many-plumed and monstrous helmet, which crashes through walls and cellars, could now give a single shiver to the most timorous Cambridge don, while we suspect that the majority of modern students would, like the author, leave Matilda and Isabella talking in the middle of a paragraph, but from a different kind of weariness. Autres temps, autres mœurs — especially in the matter of Gothic romance.

CHAPTER VII.

State of French Society in 1765; Walpole at Paris; the Royal Family and the bête du Gévaudan; French ladies of quality; Madame du Deffand; a letter from Madame de Sévigné; Rousseau and the King of Prussia; the Hume-Rousseau quarrel; returns to England and hears Wesley at Bath; Paris again; Madame du Deffand's vitality; her character; minor literary efforts; the “Historic Doubts”; the “Mysterious Mother”; tragedy in England; doings of the Strawberry Press; Walpole and Chatterton.

VII.

WHEN, towards the close of 1765, Walpole made the first of several visits to Paris, the society of the French capital, and indeed French society generally, was showing signs of that coming culbute générale which was not to be long deferred. The upper classes were shamelessly immoral, and, from the King downwards, liaisons of the most open character excited neither censure nor comment. It was the era of Voltaire and the Encyclopædists; it was the era of Rousseau and the Sentimentalists; it was also the era of confirmed Anglo-mania. While we, on our side, were beginning to copy the comédies larmoyantes of La Chaussée and Diderot, the French in their turn were acting Romeo and Juliet and raving over Richardson. Richardson's chief rival in their eyes was Hume, then a chargé d'affaires, and in spite of his plain face and bad French, the idol of the freethinkers. He "is treated here," says Walpole, "with perfect veneration," and we learn from other sources that no lady's toilette was complete without his attendance. "At the Opera,"—says Lord Charlemont,— "his broad unmeaning face was usually seen entre deux jolis minois; the ladies in France gave the ton, and the ton was Deism." Apart from literature, irreligion, and philosophy, the chief occupation was cards. "Whisk and Richardson" is Walpole's later definition of French society; "Whisk and disputes," that of Hume. According to Walpole, a kind of pedantry and solemnity was the characteristic of conversation, and "laughing was as much out of fashion as pantins or bilboquets. Good folks, they have no time to laugh.

There is God and the King to be pulled down first; and men and women, one and all, are devoutly employed in the demolition." How that enterprise eventuated history has recorded.

It is needless, however, to rehearse the origins of the French Revolution, in order to make a background for the visit of an English gentleman to Paris in 1765. Walpole had been meditating this journey for two or three years, but the state of his health among other things (he suffered much from gout) had from time to time postponed it. In 1763, he had been going next spring;* but when next spring came he talked of the beginning of 1765. Nevertheless, in March of that year, Gilly Williams writes to Selwyn: "Horry Walpole has now postponed his journey till May," and then he goes on to speak of the Castle of Otranto in a way which shows that all the author's friends were not equally enthusiastic respecting that ingenious romance. "How do you think he has employed that leisure which his political frenzy has allowed of? In writing a novel . . . and such a novel

* It is curious to note in one of his letters of 1763 a mot which may be compared with the famous "Good Americans, when they die, go to Paris." Walpole is more sardonic. "Paris," he says, "like the description of the grave, is the way of all flesh."

that no boarding-school miss of thirteen could get through without yawning. It consists of ghosts and enchantments; pictures walk out of their frames, and are good company for half an hour together; helmets drop from the moon, and cover half a family. He says it was a dream, and I fancy one when he had some feverish disposition in him.* May, however, had arrived and passed, and the Castle of Otranto was in its second edition, before Walpole at last set out, on Monday, the 9th September, 1765. After a seven hours' passage, he reached Calais from Dover. Near Amiens he was refreshed by a sight of one of his favourites, Lady Mary Coke, "in peagreen and silver"; at Chantilly he was robbed of his portmanteau. By the time he reached Paris on the 13th, he had already "fallen in love with twenty things, and in hate with forty." The dirt of Paris, the narrowness of the streets, the "trees clipped to resemble brooms, and planted on pedestals of chalk," disgust him. But he is enraptured with the treillage and fountains "and will prove it at Strawberry." He detests the French opera, but loves the French opera-comique with its Italian comedy and his passion — "his dear favourite harlequin." But, upon the whole, in these first impressions he is disappointed. Society is duller than he expected, and with the staple topics of its conversation, philosophy, literature, and freethinking, he is (or says he is) out of sympathy. "Freethinking is for one's self, surely not for society . . . I dined to-day with half a dozen savans, and though all the servants were waiting, the conversation was much more unrestrained, even on the Old Testament, than I would suffer at my own table in England, if a single footman was present. For literature, it is very amusing when one has nothing else to do. I think it rather pedantic in society; tiresome when displayed professedly; and, besides, in this country one is sure it is only a 'fashion of the day.'" And then he goes on to say that the reigning fashion is Richardson and Hume.*

* Gilly Williams to Selwyn, 19 March, 1765.

One of his earliest experiences was his presentation at Versailles to the royal family, a ceremony which luckily involved but one operation instead of several as in England, where the Princess Dowager of Wales, the Duke of Cumberland, and the Princess Amelia had all their different levees. He gives an account of this to Lady Hervey; but repeats it on the same day with much greater detail in a letter to Chute. “You perceive (he says) that I have been presented. The Queen took great notice of me [for which reason, in imitation of Madame de Sévigné, he tells Lady Hervey that she is le plus grand roi du monde]; none of the rest said a syllable. You are let into the King’s bed-chamber just as he has put on his shirt; he dresses and talks good-humouredly to a few, glares at strangers, goes to mass, to dinner, and a-hunting. The good old Queen, who is like Lady Primrose in the face, and Queen Caroline in the immensity of her cap, is at her dressing-table attended by two or three old ladies. . . . Thence you go to the Dauphin, for all is done in an hour. He scarce stays a minute; indeed, poor creature, he is a ghost, and cannot possibly last three months. [He died, in fact, within this time, on the 20th December.] The Dauphiness is in her bedchamber, but dressed and standing; looks cross, is not civil, and has the true Westphalian grace and accents. The four Mesdames [these were the Graille, Chiffe, Coche, and Loque of history] who are clumsy plump old wenches, with a bad likeness to their father, stand in a bedchamber in a row, with black cloaks and knotting bags, looking good-humoured, [and] not knowing what to say. . . . This ceremony is very short; then you are carried to the Dauphin's three boys, who you may be sure only bow and stare. The Duke of Berry [afterwards Louis XVI] looks weak and weak-eyed: the Count de Provence [Louis XVIII] is a fine boy; the Count d'Artois [Charles X] well enough. The whole concludes with seeing the Dauphin's little girl dine, who is as round and as fat as a pudding.”* Such is Walpole’s account of the royal family of France on exhibition. In the Queen’s antechamber he was treated to a sight of the famous bête du Gévaudan, a monstrous wolf of which a highly sensational representation had been given in the St. James’s Chronicle for the previous June. It had just been shot, after a triumphant and nefarious career, and was exhibited by two chasseurs “with as much parade as if it was Mr. Pitt.”†

* Walpole to Montagu, 22 September, 1765.

When he had been at Paris little more than

* Walpole to Chute, 3 October, 1765.

† Madame de Genlis mentions this fearsome beast in her Mé-

moires :—“Tout le monde à entendu parler de la hyène de Gévaudan, qui a fait tant de ravages.”

a month, he was laid up with the gout in both feet. He was visited in his illness by Wilkes, for whom he expresses no admiration. From another letter it appears that Sterne and Foote were also visiting the French capital at this time. In November, he is still limping about, and it is evident that confinement "in a bed-chamber in a hôtel garni . . . when the court is at Fontainebleau," has not been without its effect upon his views of things in general. In writing to Gray (who replies with all sorts of kindly remedies), he says "the charms of Paris have not the least attraction for me, nor would keep me an hour on their own account. For the city itself, I cannot conceive where my eyes were: it is the ugliest beastliest town in the universe. I have not seen a mouthful of verdure out of it, nor have they anything green but their treillage and window shutters. . . Their boasted knowledge of society is reduced to talking of their suppers, and every malady they have about them, or know of." A day or two later his gout and his stick have left him, and his good humour is coming back. Before the end of the month, he is growing reconciled to his environment; and by January "France is so agreeable, and England so much the reverse," he tells Lady Hervey, "that he does not know when he shall return." The great ladies, too, Madame de Brionne, Madame d'Aiguillon, Marshal Richelieu's daughter, Madame d'Egmont (with whom he could fall in love if it would break anybody's heart in England), begin to flatter and caress him. "His last new passion" is the Duchess de Choiseul, who is so charming "that you would take her for the queen of an allegory." "One dreads its finishing, as much as a lover, if she would admit one, would wish it should finish." There is also a beautiful Countess de Forcalquier, the "broken music" of whose elementary English stirs him into heroics too Arcadian for the meridian of London where Lady Hervey is warned not to exhibit them to the profane.*

In a letter of later date to Gray, he describes some more of these graceful and witty leaders of fashion, whose "douceur" he seems to have greatly preferred to the pompous and arrogant was so great as to interrupt the play. The point of this, in a recent repetition of the anecdote, was a little blunted by the printer's substitution of "bête" for "belle."

* Of Mad. de Forcalquier it is related that, entering a theatre during the performance of Gresset's Le Méchant, just as the line was uttered, "La faute est aux dieux qui la firent si belle," the applause

fatuity of the men. "They have taken up gravity"—he says of these latter—"thinking it was philosophy and English, and so have acquired nothing in the room of their natural levity and cheerfulness." But with the women the case is different. He knows six or seven "with very superior understandings; some of them with wit, or with softness, or very good sense." His first portrait is of the famous Madame Geoffrin, to whom he had been recommended by Lady Hervey, and who had visited him when imprisoned in his chambre garni. He lays stress upon her knowledge of character, her tact and good sense, and the happy mingling of freedom and severity by which she preserved her position as "an epitome of empire, subsisting by rewards and punishments." Then there is the Maréchale de Mirepoix, a courtier and intrigante of the first order. "She is false, artful, and insinuating beyond measure when it is her interest, but indolent and a coward"—says Walpole, who does not measure his words even when speaking of a beauty and a Princess of Lorraine. Others are the savante, Madame de Boufflers, who visited England and Johnson, and whom the writer hits off neatly by saying that you would think she was always sitting for her picture to her biographer; a second savante, Madame de Rochfort, “the decent friend” of Walpole’s visitor at Strawberry, the Duc de Nivernois; the already mentioned Duchess de Choiseul, and Madame la Maréchale de Luxembourg, whose youth had been stormy, but who was now softening down into a kind of twilight melancholy which made her rather attractive. This last, with one exception, completes his list.

The one exception is a figure which henceforth played no inconsiderable part in Walpole’s correspondence—that of the brilliant and witty Madame du Deffand. As Marie de Vichy-Chamroud, she had been married at one-and-twenty to the nobleman whose name she bore, and had followed the custom of her day by speedily choosing a lover, who had many successors. For a brief space she had captivated the Regent himself, and at this date, being nearly seventy and hopelessly blind, was continuing, from mere force of habit, a “decent friendship” with the deaf President Hénault. At first Walpole was not impressed with her, and speaks of her, disrespectfully, as “an old blind debauchee of wit.” A little later, although he still refers to her as the “old lady of the house,” he says she is very agreeable. Later still, she has completed her conquest by telling him he has le fou mocquer; and in the letter to Gray above quoted, it is plain that she has become an object of absorbing interest to him, not unmixed with a nervous apprehension of her undisguised partiality for his society. In spite of her affliction (he says) she “retains all her vivacity, wit, memory, judgment, passions, and agreeableness. She goes to Operas, Plays, suppers, and Versailles; gives suppers twice a week; has every thing new read to her; makes new songs and epigrams, ay, admirably,* and remembers every one that has been made these fourscore years. She corresponds with Voltaire, dictates charming letters to him, contradicts him, is no bigot to him or anybody, and laughs both at the clergy and the philosophers. In a dis-

* One of her logogriphes is as follows:—

“*Quoique je forme un corps, je ne suis qu'une idée ;
Plus ma beauté vieillit, plus elle est décidée :
Il faut, pour me trouver, ignorer d'où je viens :
Je tiens tout de lui, qui réduit tout à rien.*”

The answer is noblesse. Lord Chesterfield thought it so good that he sent it to his godson (Letter 166).

pute, into which she easily falls, she is very warm, and yet scarce ever in the wrong: her judgment on every subject is as just as possible: on every point of conduct as wrong as possible: for she is all love and hatred, passionate for her friends to enthusiasm, still anxious to be loved, I don't mean by lovers, and a vehement enemy, but openly. As she can have no amusement but conversation, the least solitude and ennui are insupportable to her, and put her into the power of several worthless people who eat her suppers when they can eat nobody's of higher rank; wink to one another and laugh at her; hate her because she has forty times more parts—and venture to hate her because she is not rich."* In another letter to Mr. James Crawford of Auchinames (Hume's Fish Crawford), who was also one of Madame du Deffand's admirers, he says, in repeating some of the above details, that he is not "ashamed of interesting himself exceedingly about her. To say nothing of her extraordinary parts, she is certainly the most generous friendly being upon earth." Upon her side Madame du Deffand seems to have been equally attracted by the strange mixture of independence and effeminacy which went to make up Walpole's character. Her fondness for him rapidly grew into a kind of infatuation. He had no sooner quitted Paris, which he did on the 17th April, than she began to correspond with him, and thenceforward, until her death in 1780, her letters, dictated to her faithful secretary Wiart, continued, except when Walpole was actually visiting her (and she sometimes wrote to him even then), to reach him regularly. Not long after his return to England, she made him the victim of a charming hoax. He had, when in Paris, admired a snuff-box, which bore a portrait of Madame de Sévigné, for whom he professed an extravagant admiration. Madame du Deffand procured a similar box, had the portrait copied, and sent it to him with a letter, purporting to come from the dateless Elysian Fields and "Notre Dame de Livry" herself, in which he was enjoined to use his present always, and to bring it often to France and the Faubourg St. Germain. Walpole was completely taken in, and imagined that the box had come from Madame de Choiseul; but he should have known that no one living but his blind friend could have written "that most charming of all letters." The box itself, the memento of so much old-world ingenuity, was sold (with the pseudo-Sévigné letter) at the Strawberry Hill sale for £28 7s. When witty Mrs. Clive heard of the last addition to Walpole's list of favourites, she delivered herself of a good-humoured bon mot. There was a new resident at Twickenham — the Earl of Shelburne's widow. "If the new Countess is but lame," quoth Clive (referring to the fact that Lady Suffolk was deaf and Madame du Deffand blind), "I shall have no chance of ever seeing you." But there is nothing to show that he ever relaxed in his attentions to the delightful actress whom he somewhere styles dimidium animæ meæ.

* Walpole to Gray, 25 Jan., 1766.

One of the other illustrious visitors to Paris during Walpole's stay there was Rousseau. Being no longer safe in his Swiss asylum, where the curate of Motiers had excited the mob against him, that extraordinary self-tormentor, clad in his Armenian costume, had arrived in December, at the French capital, and shortly afterwards left for England under the safe conduct of Hume, who had undertaken to procure him a fresh resting-place. He reached

London on the 14th January. Walpole had, to use his own phrase, “a hearty contempt” for the fugitive sentimentalist and his grievances, and not long before Rousseau’s advent in Paris, taking for his pretext an offer made by the King of Prussia, he had woven some of the light mockery at Madame Geoffrin’s into a sham letter from Frederick to Jean-Jacques, couched in the true Walpolean spirit of persiflage. It is difficult to summarise, and may be reproduced here as its author transcribed it on 12 January, 1766, for the benefit of Conway: —

LE ROI DE PRUSSE À MONSIEUR ROUSSEAU.
MON CHER JEAN JACQUES,

Vous avez renoncé à Génève votre patrie; vous vous êtes fait chasser de la Suisse; pays tant vanté dans vos écrits; la France vous a décrété. Venez donc chez moi; j’admire vos talens; je m’amuse de vos rêveries, qui (soit dit en passant) vous occupent trop, et trop-long tems. Il faut à la fin être sage et heureux. Vous avez fait assez parler de vous par des singularités peu convenables à un véritable grand homme. Démontrez à vos ennemis que vous pouvez avoir quelquefois le sens commun: cela les fachera, sans vous faire tort. Mes états vous offrent une retraite paisible; je vous veux du bien, et je vous en ferai, si vous le trouvez bon. Mais si vous obstinez à rejeter mon secours, attendez-vous que je ne le dirai à personne. Si vous persistez à vous creuser l’esprit pour trouver de nouveaux malheurs, choisissez les tels que vous voudrez. Je suis roi, je puis vous en procurer au gré de vos souhaits : et ce qui sûrement ne vous arrivera pas vis à vis de vos ennemis, je cesseraï de vous persécuter quand vous cesserez de mettre votre gloire à l'être.

Votre bon ami, FRÉDÉRIC.

This composition, the French of which was touched up by Helvetius, Hénault, and the Duc de Nivernois, gave extreme satisfaction to all the anti-Rousseau party. While Hume and his protégé were still in Paris, Walpole, out of delicacy to Hume, managed to keep the matter a secret, and he also abstained from making any overtures to Rousseau, whom, as he truly said, he could scarcely have visited cordially with a letter in his pocket written to ridicule him. But Hume had no sooner departed, than Frederick's sham invitation went the round, ultimately finding its way across the Channel, where it was printed in the St. James's Chronicle. Rousseau, always on the alert to pose as the victim of plots and conspiracies, was naturally furious, and wrote angrily from his retreat at Mr. Davenport's in Derbyshire to denounce the fabrication. The worst of it was, that his morbid nature immediately suspected the innocent Hume of participating in the trick. "What rends my heart is,"—he told the Chron- icle,—“that the impostor has accomplices in England” and this delusion became one of the main elements in that “twice-told tale,”—the quarrel of Hume and Rousseau. Walpole was called upon to clear Hume from having any hand in the letter, and several communications, all of which are printed at length in the fourth volume of his works, followed upon the same subject. Their discussion would occupy too large a space in this limited memoir.* It is however worth noticing that Walpole’s instinct appears to have foreseen the trouble that fell upon Hume. “I wish,” he wrote to Lady Hervey, in a letter which Hume carried to England when he accompanied his intractable protégé thither, “I wish he may not repent having engaged with Rousseau, who contradicts and quarrels with all mankind, in order to obtain their admiration.”† He certainly, upon the present occasion, did not belie this uncomplimentary character.

* Hume’s narrative of the affair may be read in A Concise and Genuine Account of the Dispute between Mr. Hume and Mr. Rousseau; with the Letters that passed between them during their Controversy. As also the Letters of the Hon. Mr. Walpole and Mr. D’Al- embert, relative to this extraordinary Affair. Translated from the French. London. Printed for T. Becket and P. A. de Hondt, near Surry-street, in the Strand, 1766.

† Walpole to Lady Hervey, 2 January, 1766.

Before the last stages of the Hume-Rousseau controversy had been reached, Hume was back again in Paris, and Walpole had returned to London. Upon the whole, he told Mann, he liked France so well that he should certainly go there again. In September, 1766, he was once more attacked with gout, and went to Bath, whose Avon (as compared with his favourite Thames) he considers "paltry enough to be the Seine or Tyber." Nothing pleases him much at Bath, although it contained such notabilities as Lord Chatham, Lord Northington, and Lord Camden; but he goes to hear Wesley, of whom he writes rather flippantly to Chute. He describes him as "a lean, elderly man, fresh-coloured, his hair smoothly combed, with a soupc̄on of curl at the ends." "Wondrous clean (he adds) but as evidently an actor as Garrick. He spoke his sermon, but so fast, and with so little accent, that I am sure he has often uttered it, for it was like a lesson. There were parts and eloquence in it; but towards the end he exalted his voice, and acted very ugly enthusiasm, decried learning, and told stories, like Latimer, of the fool of his college who said, "I thanks God for everything."*

* Walpole to Chute, 10 Oct., 1766.

He returned to Strawberry Hill in October. In August of the next year he again went to Paris, going almost straight to Madame du Deffand's where he finds Mademoiselle Clairon (who had quitted the stage) invited to declaim Corneille in his honour, and he sups in a distinguished company. His visit upon this occasion lasted two months, but his letters for this period contain few interesting particulars, while those of the lady cease altogether, to be resumed again on the 9th October, a few hours after his departure. Two years later he goes once more to Paris and his blind friend, whom he finds in better health than ever, and with spirits so increased that he tells her she will go mad with age. "When they ask her how old she is, she answers, J'ai soixante et mille ans." Her septuagenarian activity might well have wearied a younger man. "She and I (he says) went to the Boulevard last night after supper, and drove about there till two in the morning. We are going to sup in the country this evening, and are to go to-morrow night at eleven to the puppet-show." In a letter to George Montagu, which adds some further details to her portrait, he writes:— "I have heard her dispute with all sorts of people, on all sorts of subjects, and never knew her in the wrong. She humbles the learned, sets right their disciples, and finds conversation for everybody. Affectionate as Madame de Sévigné, she has none of her prejudices, but a more universal taste; and, with the most delicate frame, her spirits hurry her through a life of fatigue that would kill me, if I was to continue here. I had great difficulty last night to persuade her, though she was not well, not to sit up till between two and three for the comet; for which purpose she had appointed an astronomer to bring his telescopes to the president Henault's, as she thought it would amuse me. In short, her goodness to me is so excessive, that I feel unashamed at producing my withered person in a round of diversions, which I have quitted at home."* One of the other amusements which she procured for him was the entrée of the famous convent of Saint Cyr, of which he gives an interesting account. He inspects the pensioners and the numerous portraits of the foundress, Madame de Maintenon. In one class-room he hears the young ladies sing the choruses in Athalie; in another sees them dance minuets to the violin of a nun who is not precisely St. Cecilia. In a third room they act proverbes by the foundress. Finally he is enabled to enrich the archives of Strawberry with a piece of paper containing a few sentences of that illustrious lady's handwriting.

* Walpole to Montagu, 7 September, 1769.

Walpole's literary productions for this date (in addition to the letter from the King of Prussia to Rousseau) are scheduled in the Short Notes with his usual minuteness. In June, 1766, shortly after his return from Paris, he wrote a squib upon Captain Byron's description of the Patagonians, entitled An Account of the Giants recently discovered, which was published on the 25th August. On 18 August, he began his Memoirs of the Reign of King George the Third, and, in 1767, the detection of a work published at Paris in two volumes under the title of the Testament du Chevalier Robert Walpole and "stamped in that mint of forgeries, Holland." This, which is printed in the second volume of his works, remained unpublished during his lifetime, as no English translation of the Testament was ever made. His next deliverance was a letter, subsequently printed in the St. James's Chronicle for 28 May, in which he announced to the Corporation of Lynn, in the person of their Mayor, Mr. Langley, that he did not intend to offer himself again as the representative in Parliament of that town. A wish to retire from all public business and the declining state of his health are assigned as the reason for his thus breaking his Parliamentary connection, which had now lasted for five-and-twenty years. Following upon this comes the account of his action in the Hume and Rousseau quarrel, which ultimately found a place in the fourth volume of his works, and a couple of letters on Political Abuse in Newspapers. These appeared in the Public Advertiser. But the chief results of his leisure in 1766–8 are to be found in two efforts more ambitious than any of those above mentioned, The Historic Doubts on Richard the Third, and the tragedy of The Mysterious Mother. The Historic Doubts was begun in the winter of 1767 and published in February, 1768; the tragedy in December, 1766, and published in March, 1768.

The Historic Doubts was a paradoxical attempt to vindicate Richard III from his traditional character, which Walpole considered had been intentionally blackened in order to whiten that of Henry VII. “Vous seriez un excellent avocat général,”—wrote Voltaire to him,—“vous pesez toutes les probabilités.” He might have added that they were all weighed on one side. Gray admits the clearness with which the principal part of the arguments was made out; but he remained unconvinced, especially as regards the murder of Henry VI. Other opponents speedily appeared, who were neither so friendly nor so gentle. The Critical Review attacked him for not having referred to Guthrie’s History of England, which had in some respects anticipated him; and he was also criticised adversely by the London Chronicle. Of these attacks Walpole spoke and wrote very contemptuously; but he seems to have been considerably nettled by the conduct of a Swiss named Deverdun, who, giving an account of the book in a work called Mémoires Littéraires de la Grande Bretagne for 1768, declared his preference for the views which Hume had expressed in certain notes to the said account. Deverdun’s action appears to have stung Walpole into a supplementary defence of his theories, in which he dealt with his critics generally.

This he did not print, but left it to appear as a postscript in his works. In 1770, however, his arguments were contested by Dr. Milles, Dean of Exeter, to whom he replied; and later still another antiquary, the Rev. Mr. Masters, came forward. The last two assailants were members of the Society of Antiquaries, from which body, Walpole, in consequence, withdrew. But he practically abandoned his theories in a postscript written in February, 1793, which is to be found in the second volume of his works.

Concerning the second work, The Mysterious Mother, most of Walpole's biographers are content to abide in generalities. That the proprietor of Gothic Strawberry should have produced The Castle of Otranto has a certain congruity, but one scarcely expects to find the same person indulging in a tragedy sombre enough to have taxed the powers of Ford or Webster. It is a curious example of literary reaction, and his own words respecting it are contradictory. To Montagu and to Madame du Deffand he writes apologetically. “Il ne vous plairoit pas assurément”—he says to the lady;—“il n'y a pas de beaux sentiments. Il n'y a que des passions sans enveloppe, des crimes, des repentis, et des *horreurs, and he lays his finger on one of its gravest defects when he goes on to say that its interest languishes from the first act to the last. Yet he seems, too, to have thought of its being played, for he tells Montagu a month later that though he is not yet intoxicated enough with it to think it would do for the stage, yet he wishes to see it acted,—a wish which must have been a real one,—since he says further that he has written an epilogue for Mrs. Clive to speak in character. The postscript which is affixed to the printed piece contradicts the above utterances considerably, or, at all events, shows that fuller consideration has materially revised them. He admits that The Mysterious Mother would not be proper to appear upon the boards. “The subject is so horrid, that I thought it would shock rather than give satisfaction to an audience. Still I found it so truly tragic in the two essential springs of terror and pity, that I could not resist the impulse of adapting it to the scene, though it should never be practicable to produce it there.” After his criticism to Madame du Deffand upon the plot, it is curious to find him later on claiming that “every scene tends to bring on the catastrophe, and [that] the story is never interrupted or diverted from its course." Notwithstanding its imaginative power, it is impossible not to admit that the author's words as to the horror of the subject are just. But it is needless to linger longer upon a dramatic work which had such grave defects as to render its being acted impossible, and concerning the literary merit of which there will always be different opinions. Byron spoke of it as "a tragedy of the highest order"; Miss Burney shuddered at its very name; while Lady Di Beauclerk illustrated it enthusiastically with a series of seven designs in "soot-water" * for which the enraptured author erected a special gallery.† Meanwhile, we may quote, from the close of the above postscript, a passage where Walpole is at his best. It is a rapid and characteristic aperçu of tragedy in England:—

* Letters of Madame du Deffand, 1810, i, 211, n.

"The excellence of our dramatic writers is by no means equal in number to the great men we have produced in other walks. Theatric genius lay dormant after Shakespeare; waked with some bold and glorious, but irregular and often ridiculous flights in Dryden; revived in Otway; maintained a placid pleasing kind of dignity in Rowe, and even shone in his Jane Shore. It trod in sublime and classic fetters in Cato, but void of nature, or the power of affecting the passions. In Southerne it seemed a genuine ray of nature and Shakespeare; but falling on an age still more Hottentot, was stifled in those gross and barbarous productions, tragi-comedies. It turned to tuneful nonsense in the Mourning Bride; grew stark mad in Lee; whose cloak, a little the worse for wear, fell on Young; yet in both was still a poet's cloak. It recovered its senses in Hughes and Fenton, who were afraid it should relapse, and accordingly kept it down with a timid, but amiable hand—and then it languished. We have not mounted again above the two last."*

* I.e.—soot-water. There were two landscapes in soot-water by Mr. Bentley in the Green Closet at Strawberry.

† See Chapter ix.

The Castle of Otranto and the Historic Doubts were not printed by Mr. Robinson's latest successor, Mr. Kirgate. But the Strawberry Press had by this time resumed its functions, for The Mysterious Mother, of which 50 copies were printed in 1768, was issued from it. Another book which it produced in the same year was Cornélie, a youthful tragedy by Madame du Deffand's friend, President Hénault. Walpole's sole reason for giving it the permanence of his type appears to have been gratitude to the venerable author, then fast hastening to the grave, for his kindness to himself in Paris. To Paris three-fourths of the impression went. More important reprints were Grammont's Memoirs, a small quarto, and a series of Letters of Edward VI, both printed in 1772. The list for this period is completed by the loose sheets of Hoyland's Poems, 1769, and the well-known, but now rare Description of the Villa of Horace Walpole at Strawberry Hill, 100 copies of which were printed, six being on large paper. To the contents of this book, the ensuing chapter will be chiefly devoted. The present may fitly be concluded with a brief account of that always-debated passage in Walpole's life, his relations with the ill-fated Chatterton.

* Works, 1798, i, 129.

In 1768, Chatterton, fretting in Mr. Lambert's office at Bristol, and casting about eagerly for possible clues to a literary life, had offered some specimens of the pseudo-Rowley to Dodsley of Pall Mall, but apparently without success. His next appeal was to Walpole, to whom he sent

"a little poem of two or three stanzas, in alternate rhyme, on the death of Richard I," together with an intimation that the possessor could furnish him with accounts of a series of great painters that had flourished at Bristol. The packet was handed to Walpole by Mr. Bathoe, his bookseller (also notable as the keeper of the first circulating library in London); and, incredible to say, Walpole was instantly "drawn." He straightway dispatched to his unknown Bristol correspondent such a courteous note as he might have addressed to Zouch or Ducarel, expressing interest, curiosity, and a desire for further particulars. Chatterton as promptly rejoined, forwarding more extracts from the Rowley poems. But he also, from Walpole's account of his letter, in part unbosomed himself, making revelation of his position as a widow's son and lawyer's apprentice, who had "a taste and turn for more elegant studies," which inclinations, he hinted, his illustrious correspondent might enable him to gratify. Upon this, perhaps not unnaturally, Walpole's suspicions were aroused, the more so that Mason and Gray, to whom he showed the papers, declared them to be forgeries. He made, nevertheless, some private enquiry from an aristocratic relative at Bath as to Chatterton's antecedents, and found that, although his description of himself was accurate, no account of his character was forthcoming. He accordingly, by his own statement, wrote him a letter "with as much kindness and tenderness as if he had been his guardian," recommending him to stick to his profession, and adding, by way of postscript, that judges, to whom they had been submitted, were by no means satisfied as to the authenticity of his supposed MSS. Two letters from Chatterton followed,—one (the first) dejected and seemingly acquiescent; the other curtly demanding the restoration of his papers, the genuineness of which he re-affirmed. This second communication Walpole, then starting for Paris, overlooked. When he returned to England, he found waiting for him a third note which he seems to have also neglected. A few weeks afterwards arrived a fourth missive, the tone of which he regarded as "singularly impertinent." Snapping up both poems and letters in a pet, he scribbled a hasty reply, but, upon reconsideration, enclosed them to their writer without comment, and thought no more of him or them. It was not until a year and a half later that Goldsmith told him, at the first Royal Academy dinner, that Chatterton had come to London and destroyed himself—an announcement which seems to have filled him with unaffected pity. “Several persons of honour and veracity,” he says, “were present when I first heard of his death, and will attest my surprise and concern.”*

The apologists of the gifted and precocious Bristol boy, reading the above occurrences by the light of his deplorable end, have attributed to Walpole a more material part in his misfortunes than can justly be ascribed to him, and the first editor of Chatterton’s Miscellanies did not scruple to emphasise the current gossip which represented Walpole as “the primary cause of his (Chatterton’s) dismal catastrophe”†—an aspersion which drew from the Abbot of

* In the above summary of the story we have preferred, notwithstanding some difficulties, the version given in Prof. D. Wilson’s Chatterton, 1869, which seems fairest to Walpole, and most plausible in its interpretation of the facts.

† An example of this is furnished by Miss Seward’s Correspondence. “Do not expect (she writes) that I can learn to esteem that fastidious and unfeeling being, to whose insensibility we owe the extinction of the greatest poetic luminary [Chatterton], if we may judge from the brightness of its dawn, that ever rose in our, or perhaps in any other hemisphere” (Seward to Hardinge, 21 Nov., 1787).

Strawberry the lengthy letter on the subject which is printed in his Works.* So long a vindication, if needed then, is scarcely needed now. Walpole, it is obvious, behaved very much as he might have been expected to behave. He had been deceived, and he was as much annoyed with himself as with his deceiver. But he was not harsh enough to speak his mind frankly, nor benevolent enough to act the part of that rather rare personage, the ideal philanthropist. If he had behaved less like an ordinary man of the world,—if he had obtained Chatterton's confidence instead of lecturing him,—if he had aided and counselled and protected him,—Walpole would have been different, and things might have been otherwise. As they were, upon the principle that “two of a trade can ne'er agree,” it is difficult to conceive of any abiding alliance between the author of the fabricated Tragedy of Ælla and the author of the fabricated Castle of Otranto.

* Works, 1798, iv, 205–45.

FERRY MORAN.

CHAPTER VIII.

Old friends and new ; Walpole's nieces ; Mrs. Damer ; progress of Strawberry Hill ; festivities and later improvements ; "A Description," etc., 1774 ; the house and approaches ; Great Parlour, Waiting Room, China Room, and Yellow Bedchamber ; Breakfast Room ; Green Closet and Blue Bedchamber ; Armoury and Library ; Red Bedchamber, Holbein Chamber, and Star Chamber ; Gallery ; Round Drawing Room and Tribune ; Great North Bedchamber ; Great Cloister and Chapel ; Walpole on Strawberry ; its dampness ; a drive from Twickenham to Piccadilly.

VIII.

IN 1774, when, according to its title-page, the Description of Strawberry Hill was printed, Walpole was a man of fifty-seven. During the period covered by the last chapter, many changes had taken place in his circle of friends. Mann and George Montagu (until, in October, 1770, his correspondence with the latter mysteriously ceased) were still the most frequent recipients of his letters, and next to these, Conway and Cole the antiquary. But three of his former correspondents, Gray, his deaf neighbour at Marble Hill, Lady Suffolk,* and Lady Hervey (Pope's and Chesterfield's Molly Lepel, to whom he had written much from Paris), were dead. On the other hand, he had opened what promised to be a lengthy series of letters with Gray's friend and biographer, the Rev. William Mason, Rector of Aston in Yorkshire, with Madame du Deffand, and with the divorced Duchess of Grafton, who, in 1769, had married his Paris friend, John Fitzpatrick, second Earl of Upper Ossory. There were changes, too, among his own relatives. By this time his eldest brother's widow, Lady Orford, had lost her second husband, Sewallis Shirley, and was again living, not very creditably, on the continent. Her son George, who since 1751 had been third Earl of Orford, and was still unmarried, was eminently unsatisfactory. He was shamelessly selfish, and by way of complicating the family embarrassments, had taken to the turf. Ultimately he had periodical attacks of insanity, during which time it fell to Walpole's fate to look after his affairs. With Sir Edward Walpole, his second brother, he seems never to have been on terms of real cordiality; but he made no secret of his pride in his beautiful nieces, Edward Walpole's natural daughters, whose charms and amiability had victoriously triumphed over every prejudice which had been entertained against their birth. Laura, the eldest, had married a brother of Lord Albemarle, who afterwards became Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry; Charlotte, the third, became Lady Huntingtower and afterwards Countess of Dysart; while Maria, the belle of the trio, was more fortunate still. After burying her first husband, Lord Waldegrave, she had succeeded in fascinating H. R. H. William Henry, Duke of Gloucester, the King's own brother, and so contributing to bring about the Royal Marriage Act of 1772. They were married in 1766; but the fact was not formally announced to His Majesty until September, 1772.* Another marriage which must have given Wal-

* Henrietta Hobart, Countess Dowager of Suffolk, died in July, 1767. Her portrait by Charles Jervas, with Marble Hill in the background, hung in the Green Bedchamber at Strawberry. It once belonged to Pope, who left it to Martha Blount, and it is engraved in vol. ii of Cunningham's edition of the Letters.

* "The Duke of Gloucester,"—wrote Gilly Williams to Selwyn, as far back as December, 1764,—“has professed a passion for the pole almost as much pleasure was that of General Conway's daughter to Mr. Damer, Lord Milton's eldest son, which took place in 1767. After the unhappy death of her husband, who shot himself in a tavern ten years later, Mrs. Damer developed considerable talents as a sculptor, and during the last years of Walpole's life was a frequent exhibitor at the Royal Academy. Non me Praxiteles finxit, at Anna Damer—wrote her admiring relative under one of her works, a wounded eagle in terra cotta,* and in the fourth volume of the Anecdotes of Painting, he likens “her shock dog, large as life,” to such masterpieces of antique art as the Tuscan boar and the Barberini goat.

Dowager Waldegrave. He is never from her elbow. This flatters Horry Walpole not a little, though he pretends to dislike it.”

It is time, however, to return to the story of Strawberry itself, as interrupted in Chapter v. In the introduction to Walpole's Description of 1774 a considerable interval occurs between the building of the Refectory and Library in 1753–4, and the subsequent erection of the Gallery, Round Tower, Great Cloister, and Cabinet or Tribune, which, already in contemplation in 1759, were, according to the same authority, erected in 1760 and 1761. But here, as before, the date must rather be that of the commencement than the completion of these additions. In May, 1763, he tells Cole that the Gallery is fast advancing, and in July, it is almost “in the critical minute of consummation.” In August, “all the earth is begging to come and see it.” A month afterwards, he is “keeping an inn; the sign, the ‘Gothic Castle.’” His whole time is passed in giving tickets of admission to the Gallery, and hiding himself when it is on view. “Take my advice,” he tells Montagu, “never build a charming house for yourself between London and Hampton Court: everybody will live in it but you.” A year later he is giving a great fête to the French and Spanish Ambassadors, March, Selwyn, Lady Waldegrave, and other distinguished guests, which finishes in the new room. “During dinner there were French horns and clarionets in the Cloister,” and after coffee, the guests were treated with “a syllabub milked under the cows that were brought to the brow of the terrace. Thence they went to the Printing-house, and saw a new fashionable French song printed. They drank tea in the Gallery, and at eight went away to Vauxhall.”

* The idea was borrowed from Milan:—“Non me Praxiteles, sed an inscription upon a statue at Marcus finxit Agrati!”

This last entertainment, the munificence of which, he says, the treasury of the Abbey will feel, took place in June, 1764; and it is not until four years later that we get tidings of any fresh improvements. In September, 1768, he tells Cole that he is going on with the Round Tower, or Chamber, at the end of the Gallery, which, in another letter, he says "has stood still these five years," and he is besides "playing with the little garden on the other side of the road" which had come into his hands by Franklyn's death. In May of the following year he gives another magnificent festino at Strawberry which will almost mortgage it, but the Round Tower still progresses. In October, 1770, he is building again, in the intervals of gout; this time it is the Great Bedchamber—a "sort of room which he seems likely to inhabit much time together." Next year the whole piece-meal structure is rapidly verging to completion. "The Round Tower is finished, and magnificent; and the State Bedchamber proceeds fast." In June, he is writing to Mann from the delicious bow window of the former, with Vasari's Bianca Capello (which Mann had given him) over against him, and the setting sun behind, "throwing its golden rays all round." Further on, he is building a tiny brick chapel in the garden, mainly for the purpose of receiving "two valuable pieces of antiquity," one being a painted window from Bexhill of Henry III and his Queen, given him by Lord Ashburnham, the other Cavalini's Tomb of Capoccio from the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore at Rome, which had been sent to him by Sir William (then Mr.) Hamilton, the English Minister at Naples. In August, 1772, the Great Bedchamber is finished, the house is complete, and he has "at last exhausted all his hoards and collections." Nothing remains but to make the Description and Catalogue, of which he had written to Cole as far back as 1768, and which, as already stated, he ultimately printed in 1774.

As time went on, his fresh acquisitions obliged him to add several Appendices to this issue, and the copy before us, although dated 1774, has supplements which bring the record down to 1786. A fresh edition, in royal quarto, with twenty-seven plates, was printed in 1784,* and

* From a passage in a letter of 1787 to Lady Ossory, it appears that this, though printed, was withheld, on account of certain this, or an expansion of it, re-appears in Vol. ii of his Works. With these later issues we have little to do; but with the aid of that of 1774, may essay to give some brief account of the long, straggling, many-pinnacled building, with its round tower at the end, the east front of which is figured in the black-looking little vignette upon the title-page. The entrance was on the north side, from the Teddington and Twickenham road, here shaded by lofty trees; and once within the embattled boundary wall, covered by this time with ivy, the first thing that struck the spectator was a small oratory inclosed by iron rails, with saint, altar, and holy-water basins designed en suite by Mr. Chute. On the right hand,—its gaily-coloured patches of flower-bed glimmering through a screen of iron work copied from the tomb of Roger Niger in old St. Paul's,—was the Abbot's, or Prior's Garden, which extended along the front of the house to the right of the principal entrance. This was down a small cloister to the left, at the side of the oratory, the chief decoration of which was a marble bas relief, in-difficulties caused by the over- “customers” (as he called them), weening curiosity of Walpole's the visitors to Strawberry.

STRAWBERRY HILL: GROUND PLAN—1781.

scribed “Dia Helionora,” being, in fact, a portrait of that Leonora D’Esté who turned the head of Tasso. At the end of the little cloister was the door, which opened into “a small gloomy hall” united with the staircase, the balustrades of which, designed by Bentley, were decorated with antelopes, the Walpole supporters. In the well of the staircase was a Gothic lantern of japanned tin, also due to Bentley’s fertile invention. Out of the little hall, if, instead of climbing the stairs, you turned into a little passage on your left, you found yourself in the Refectory or Great Parlour, where were accumulated the family portraits. Here, over the chimney-piece, was the conversation piece by Sir Joshua Reynolds representing the triumvirate of Selwyn, Williams, and Lord Edgecumbe, already referred to in Chapter v; here also were Sir Robert Walpole and his two wives, Catherine Shorter and Maria Skerret; Robert Walpole the second, and his wife in a white riding-habit; Horace himself by Richardson; Dorothy Walpole, his aunt, who became Lady Townshend; his sister, Lady Maria Churchill, and a number of others. In the Waiting Room, into which the Refectory opened, was a stone head of John Dryden, whom Catherine Shorter claimed as great uncle; next to this again was the China Closet, neatly lined with blue and white Dutch tiles, and having its ceiling painted by Müntz, after a villa at Frascati, with convolvulus on poles. In the China Room, among great store of Sevres, and Chelsea, and oriental china, perhaps the greatest curiosity was a couple of Saxon tankards, exactly alike in form and size, which had been presented to Sir Robert Walpole at different times by the mistresses of the first two Georges, the Duchess of Kendal and the Countess of Yarmouth. To the left of the China Closet, with a bow window looking to the south, was the Little Parlour, which was hung with stone-coloured "gothic paper" in imitation of mosaic, and decorated with the "wooden prints" already referred to, the chiaroscuros of Jackson; and at the side of this came the Yellow Bedchamber, known later, from its numerous feminine portraits, as the Beauty Room. The other spaces on the ground floor were occupied, towards the Prior's Garden, by the kitchens and servants' rooms, and, at the back, by the Great Cloister which went under the Gallery.

Returning to the staircase where, in later years, hung Bunbury's original drawing* for his well-known caricature of "Richmond Hill," you entered the Breakfast Room on the first floor, the window of which looked towards the Thames. It was pleasantly furnished with blue paper, and blue and white linen, and contained many miniatures and portraits, notable among which were Carmontel's picture of Madame du Deffand and the Duchess de Choiseul,† a print of Madame du Deffand's room and cats, given by the President Hénault, and a view by Rauguet of the Hôtel de Carnavalet, the whilom residence of Madame de Sévigné.‡

* It was exhibited in the Royal Academy of 1781, and was Bunbury's acknowledgement of the praise given him by Walpole in the "Advertisement" to the fourth volume of the Anecdotes of Painting, 1 Oct., 1780. A copy of it was shewn at the Exhibition of English Humourists in Art, June, 1889.

† In a note to Madame du Deffand's Letters, 1810, i, 201, the editor, Miss Berry, thus describes this picture:—It was "a washed drawing of Mad. la Duchesse de Choiseul and Mad. du Deffand, under their assumed characters of grandmother and grand-daughter; Mad. de Choiseul giving Mad. du Deffand a doll. The scene the interior of Mad. du Deffand's sitting-room. It was done by M. de Carmontel, an amateur in the art of painting. He was reader to the Prince of Condé and author of several little Theatrical pieces." It is engraved in vol. vii of Walpole's Letters, by Cunningham 1857-59. Mad. du Deffand's portrait was said to be extremely like; that of the Duchess was not good.

‡ "It is now the Musée Carnavalet, and contains numberless souvenirs of the Revolution, notably a collection of china plates, bearing various dates, designs, and inscriptions applicable to the Reign of Terror" (Century Magazine, Feb., 1890, p. 600).

STRAWBERRY HILL: PRINCIPAL FLOOR—1781.

The Breakfast Room opened into the Green Closet, over the door of which was a picture by Samuel Scott, the “English Canaletti,” of Pope’s house at Twickenham, showing the wings added after the poet’s death by Sir William Stanhope. On the same side of the room hung Hogarth’s portrait of Sarah Mal-colm the murderer, painted on the day preceding her execution in Fleet Street.* Here also was “Mr. Thomas Gray; etched from his shade [silhouette]; by Mr. W. Mason.” There were many other portraits in this room, besides some water colours by Horace himself. In a line with the Green Closet, and looking east, was the Library; and at the back of it the Blue Bedchamber, the toilette of which was worked by Mrs. Clive, who since her retirement from the stage in 1769, had lived wholly at Twickenham. The chief pictures in this room were Eckardt’s portraits of Gray in a Vandyke dress and of Walpole himself in similar attire.† There were also by the same

* Both these pictures are in existence. The Scott belongs to Lady Freake, and was exhibited in the Pope Loan Museum of 1888; the Hogarth, in 1879, was at Mr. Cox’s in Pall Mall.

† Both these are engraved in Cunningham’s edition of the Letters, the former in vol. vi, p. 465, the latter in vol. ix, p. 528.

artist pictures of Walpole's father and mother, and of General Conway and his wife Lady Ailesbury.

Facing the Blue Bedchamber was the Armoury, a vestibule of three Gothic arches, in the left-hand corner of which was the door opening into the Library, a room twenty-eight feet by sixteen, lighted by a large window looking to the east and by two smaller rose-windows at the sides. The books, arranged in Gothic arches of pierced work, went all round it. The chimney-piece was imitated from the tomb of John of Eltham in Westminster Abbey, and the stone work from another tomb at Canterbury. Over the chimney-piece was a picture (which is engraved in the Anecdotes of Painting) representing the marriage of Henry VI. Walpole and Bentley had designed the ceiling, a gorgeous heraldic medley surrounding a central Walpole shield. Above the bookcases were pictures. One of the greatest treasures of the room was a clock given by Henry VIII to Anne Boleyn. Of the books it is impossible to speak in detail. Noticeable among them, however, was a Thuanus in fourteen volumes, a very complete set of Hogarth's prints, and all the original drawings for the Aedes Walpolianæ. Virtue and Faithorne were also largely represented. Among special copies were the identical Iliad and Odyssey from which Pope made his translations of Homer, a volume containing Bentley's original designs for Gray's Poems, and a note-book of sketches by Jacques Callot. In a rosewood case in this room was also a fine collection of coins, which included the rare silver medal struck by Gregory XIII, on the Massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Concerning the Red Bedchamber, the Star Chamber, and the Holbein Chamber, which intervened between the rest of the first floor and the latest additions—there is little to say. In the Red Chamber, the most memorable things were some pencil sketches of Pope and his parents by Cooper and the elder Richardson. In the Holbein Chamber, so called from a number of copies on oil-paper by Vertue from the drawings of Holbein in Queen Catharine's Closet at Kensington, were two of those "curiosities" which represent the Don Saltero, or Madame Tussaud side of Strawberry, viz., a comb which was said to have belonged to Mary, Queen of Scots and (later) the red hat of Cardinal Wolsey. The pedigree of the hat, it must, however, be admitted, was unimpeachable. It had been found in the great wardrobe by Bishop Burnet when Clerk of the Closet. From him it passed to his son the Judge (author of that curious squib on Harley known as the History of Robert Powel the Puppet-Show Man), and thence to the Countess Dowager of Albermarle, who gave it to Walpole. A carpet in this room was worked by Mrs. Clive, who seems to have been a most industrious decorator of her friend's mansion museum.* The Star Chamber was but an ante-room studded with gold stars in mosaic, the chief glory of which was a bust of Henry VII by Torregiano.

With these three rooms, the first floor of Strawberry, as it existed previous to the erection of the additions mentioned in the beginning of this chapter, namely, the Gallery, the Round Tower, the Tribune, and the Great North Bed-chamber, came to an end. But it was in these newer parts of the house that some of its rarest

* Walpole wrote an epilogue—not a very good one—for Mrs. Clive when she quitted the stage, and in the same year, 1769, the Town and County Magazine linked their names in the Têtes-à-Têtes as “Mrs. Heidelberg” (Clive’s part in the Clandestine Marriage) and “Baron Otranto.”

objects of art were assembled. The Gallery, which was entered from a gloomy little passage in front of the Holbein Chamber, was a really spacious room, fifty-six feet by fifteen and lighted from the south by five high windows. Between these were tables laden with busts, bronzes, and urns; on the opposite side fronting the windows, were recesses, finished with gold network over looking-glass, between which stood couch-seats covered, like the rest of the room, with crimson Norwich damask. The ceiling was copied from one of the side aisles of Henry VII's Chapel; the great door at the western end, which led into the Round Tower, was taken from the north door of St. Alban's. A long carpet, made at Moorfields, traversed the room from end to end. In one of the recesses, that to the left of the chimney-piece, which was designed by Mr. Chute and another, stood one of the finest surviving pieces of Greek sculpture, the Boccapadugli eagle, found in the precinct of the Baths of Caracalla, a chef d'œuvre from which Gray is said to have borrowed "the ruffled plumes and flagging wing" of the Progress of Poesy; to the right was a noble bust in basalt of Vespasian, which had been purchased from the Ottoboni collection. Of the pictures it is impossible to speak at large; but two of the most notable were Sir George Villiers, the father of the Duke of Buckingham, and Mabuse's Marriage of Henry VII and Elizabeth of York. Of Walpole's own relatives, there were portraits by Ramsay of his nieces, Mrs. Keppel (the Bishop's wife) and Lady Dysart, and of Lady Waldegrave (now Duchess of Gloucester) by Reynolds. There were also portraits of Henry Fox, Lord Holland, of George Montagu, of Lord Waldegrave, and of his uncle, Lord Walpole of Wolterton.*

Issuing through the great door of the Gallery, and passing on the left a glazed closet containing a quantity of china which had once belonged to Walpole's mother, a couple of steps brought you into the pleasant Drawing Room in the Round Tower, the bow window of which, already mentioned, looked to the south-west. Like the Gallery this room was hung with Norwich damask. Its chief glory was the picture of Bianca Capello, of which Walpole had written to Mann. To the left of this room, at the back of the Gallery, and consequently in the front of the house, was the Cabinet, or Tribune, a curious square chamber with semicircular recesses, in two of which, to the north and west, were stained windows. In the roof, which was modelled on the chapter house at York, was a star of yellow glass throwing a soft golden glow over all the room. Here Walpole had amassed his choicest treasures, miniatures by Oliver and Cooper, enamels by Petitot and Zincke,* bronzes from Italy, ivory bas-reliefs, seal-rings and reliquaries, caskets and cameos and filigree-work. Here, with Madame du Deffand's letter inside it, was the "round white snuff box" with Madame de Sévigné's portrait; here, carven with masks and flies and grasshoppers, was Cellini's silver bell from the Leonati Collection, at Parma, a masterpiece against which he had exchanged all his collection of Roman coins with the Marquis of Rockingham. A bronze bust of Caligula with silver eyes; a missal with miniatures by Raphael; a dagger

* Horatio, brother of Sir Robert Walpole, created Baron Walpole of Wolterton in 1756. He died in 1757. His Memoirs were published by Coxe in 1802.

* "The chief boast of my collection," he told Pinkerton, "is the portraits of eminent and remarkable persons, particularly the miniatures, and enamels, which, so far as I can discover, are superior to any other collection whatever.

The works I possess of Isaac and Peter Oliver are the best extant, and those I bought in Wales for 300 guineas [i. e., the Digby Family in the Breakfast Room] are as well preserved as when they came from the pencil" (Walpoliana, ii, 157).

of Henry VIII,* and a mourning ring given at the burial of Charles I, were among the other show objects of the Tribune, the riches of which occupy more space in their owner's catalogue than any other part of his collections.

With the Great North Bedchamber, which adjoined the Tribune, and filled the remaining space at the back of the Gallery, the account of Strawberry Hill, as it existed in 1774, comes to an end, for the Green Chamber in the Round Tower over the Drawing Room, and "Mr. Walpole's Bedchamber, two pair of stairs" (which contained the Warrant for beheading King Charles I inscribed "Major Charta," so often referred to by Walpole's biographers), may be dismissed without further notice. The Beauclerk Closet, a later addition, will be described in its proper place. Over the chimney-piece in the Great North Bedchamber was a large picture of Henry VIII and his children, a recent purchase, afterwards remanded to the staircase to make room for a portrait of Catherine of Braganza, sent from Portugal previous to her marriage with Charles II. Fronting the bed was a head of Niobe, by Guido, which in its turn subsequently made way for la belle Jennings.* Among the pictures on the north or window side of the room was the original sketch by Hogarth of the Beggar's Opera, which Walpole had purchased at the sale of Rich, the fortunate manager who produced Gay's masterpiece at Lincoln's Inn Fields. It was exhibited at Manchester in 1857, being then the property of Mr. Willett, who had bought it at the Strawberry Hill sale of 1842. Another curious oil painting in this room was the Rehearsal of an Opera by the Riccis, which included portraits of Nicolini (of Spectator celebrity), Mrs. Tofts, and Margherita. In a nook by the window there was a glazed china closet, with a number of minor curiosities, among which were conspicuous the speculum of cannel coal with which Dr. Dee was in the habit of gulling his votaries,† and an agate puncheon with Gray's arms which his executors had presented to Walpole.

* At the sale in 1842, King Henry's dagger was purchased for £54 12s. by Charles Kean the actor, who also became the fortunate possessor for £21 of Cardinal Wolsey's hat.

* See ch. i.

† "Doctor Dee's black stone was named in the catalogue of the collection of the Earls of Peterborough, whence it went to Lady Betty Germaine. She gave it to the last Duke of Argyle, and his son, Lord Frederic, to me." (Walpole to Lady Ossory, 12 Jan., 1782).

A few external objects claim a word. In the Great Cloister under the Gallery was the blue and white china tub in which had taken place that tragedy of the “pensive Selima” referred to in Chapter v as having prompted the muse of Gray.* The Chapel in the Garden has already been sufficiently described.† In the Flower Garden across the road was a cottage which Walpole had erected upon the site of the building once occupied by Franklyn the printer, and which he used as a place of refuge when the tide of sightseers became overpowering. It included a Tea Room containing a fair collection of china, and hung with green paper and engravings; and a little white and green Library of which the principal ornament was a half-length portrait of Milton. A portrait of Lady Hervey by Ramsay was afterwards added to its decorations.

Many objects of interest, as must be obvious, have remained undescribed in the foregoing

* This was afterwards moved to the Little Cloister at the entrance, where it appears in the later Catalogue.

† Not far from the Chapel was “a large seat in the form of a shell, carved in oak, from a design by Mr. Bentley.” It must have been roomy, for in 1759, the Duchesses of Hamilton and Richmond and Lady Ailesbury sat in it at once. “There never was so pretty a sight as to see them all sitting on the shell”—says the delighted Abbot of Strawberry.

account, and those who seek for further information concerning what its owner called his “paper fabric and assemblage of curious trifles” must consult either the catalogue of 1774 itself, or that later and definitive version of it which is reprinted in Volume ii of the Works (pp. 393–516). The intention has here been in the main to lay stress upon those articles which bear more directly upon Walpole’s biography. It will also be observed that, during the prolonged progress of the house towards completion, his experience and his views considerably enlarged, and the pettiness and artificiality of his first improvement disappeared. The house never lost, and never could lose, its invertebrate character; but the Gallery, the Round Tower, and the North Bedchamber were certainly conceived in a more serious and even spacious spirit of Gothicism than any of the early additions. That it must, still, have been confined and needlessly gloomy, may be allowed; but as a set-off to some of those accounts which insist so pertinaciously upon its “paltriness,” its “architectural solecisms” and its lack of beauty and sublimity, it is only fair to recall a few sentences from the preface which its owner prefixed to the Description of 1784. It was designed, he says of the catalogue, to exhibit “specimens of Gothic architecture, as collected from standards in cathedrals and chapel-tombs,” and to show “how they may be applied to chimney pieces, ceilings, windows, balustrades, loggias, etc.” Elsewhere he characterises the building itself as candidly as any of its critics. He admits its diminutive scale and its unsubstantial character (he calls it himself, as we have seen, a “paper fabric”); and he confesses to the incongruities arising from an antique design and modern decorations. “In truth,” he concludes, “I did not mean to make my house so Gothic as to exclude convenience, and modern refinements in luxury. . . . It was built to please my own taste, and in some degree to realise my own visions. I have specified what it contains; could I describe the gay but tranquil scene where it stands, and add the beauty of the landscape to the romantic cast of the mansion, it would raise more pleasing sensations than a dry list of curiosities can excite; at least the prospect would recall the good humour of those, who might be disposed to condemn the fantastic fabric, and to think it a very proper habitation of, as it was the scene that inspired, the author of the Castle of Otranto.* As one of his critics has observed, this tone disarms criticism; and it is needless to accumulate proofs of peculiarities which are not denied by the person most concerned.

In spite of its charming situation, Strawberry Hill was emphatically a summer residence, and there is more than one account in Walpole's letters of the sudden floods which, when Thames flowed with a fuller tide than now, occasionally surprised the inhabitants of the pleasant-looking villas along its banks. It was decidedly damp, and its gouty owner had sometimes to quit it precipitately for Arlington Street, where, he says, "after an hour," he revives "like a member of parliament's wife." His best editor, Mr. Peter Cunningham, whose knowledge as an antiquary was unrivalled,—for was he not the author of the Handbook of London?—has amused himself, in an odd corner of one of his prefaces, by retracing the route taken in these towward flights. The extract is so packed with suggestive memories that no excuse is needed for reproducing it (with a few necessary notes) as the tailpiece of the present chapter.

* Works, 1798, ii, 395–8.

"At twelve his [Walpole's] light bodied chariot was at the door with his English coachman and his Swiss valet . . . In a few minutes he left Lord Radnor's villa to the right, rolled over the grotto of Pope, saw on his left Whitton, rich with recollections of Kneller and Argyll, passed Gumley House, one of the country seats of his father's opponent and his own friend, Pulteney, Earl of Bath, and Kendal House,* the retreat of the mistress of George I, Ermengard de Schulenberg, Duchess of Kendal. At Sion, the princely seat of the Percys, the Seymours and the Smithsons, he turned into the Hounslow Road, left Sion on his right, and Osterley, not unlike Houghton, on his left, and rolled through Brentford —

'Brentford, the Bishopric of Parson Horne,' then, as now, infamous for its dirty streets and famous for its white-legged chickens.† Quitting Brentford, he approached the woods that concealed the stately mansion of Gunnersbury, built by Inigo Jones and Webb, and then inhabited by the Princess Amelia, the last sur-

* Kendal House now no longer exists.

† " ——— Brandford's tedious town,
For dirty streets, and white-leg'd chickens known."

Gay's Journey to Exeter.

viving child of King George II. Here he was often a visitor, and seldom returned without being a winner at silver loo. At the Pack Horse on Turnham Green he would, when the roads were heavy, draw up for a brief bait. Starting anew, he would pass a few red brick houses on both sides, then the suburban villas of men well to do in the Strand and Charing Cross. At Hammersmith, he would leave the church* on his right, call on Mr. Fox at Holland House, look at Campden House with recollections of Sir Baptist Hickes, and not without an ill-suspressed wish to transfer some little part of it to his beloved Strawberry. He was now at Kensington Church, then as it still is, an ungraceful structure,† but rife with associations which he would at times relate to the friend he had with him. On his left he would leave the gates of Kensington Palace, rich with reminiscences connected with his father and the first Hanoverian kings of this country. On his right he would quit the red brick house in which the

* Hammersmith church was rebuilt in 1882-3.

† The (with all due deference to Mr. Cunningham) quaint and picturesque old Church of St. Mary the Virgin, in Kensington High Street, at which Macaulay, in his later days, was a regular attendant, has now (1890) given place to a larger and more modern edifice.

Duchess of Portsmouth lived, and after a drive of half a mile (skirting a heavy brick wall), reach Kingston House replete with stories of Elizabeth Chudleigh, the Bigamist maid of Honour, and Duchess-Countess of Kingston and Bristol. At Knightsbridge (even then the haunt of highwaymen less gallant than Maclean) he passed on his left the little chapel* in which his father was married. At Hyde Park Corner he saw the Hercules Pillars ale-house of Fielding and Tom Jones,† and at one door from Park Lane would occasionally call on old 'Q' for the sake of Selwyn, who was often there.‡ The trees which now grace Piccadilly were in the Green Park in Walpole's day; they can recollect Walpole, and that is something. On his left, the sight of Coventry House would remind him of the Gunnings, and he would tell his friend the story of the 'beauties,' with which (short storyteller as he was) he had not completed when the chariot turned into Arlington Street on the right, or down Berkeley Street

* Restored and remodelled in 1861, and now the Church of the Holy Trinity.

† The Hercules Pillars, where Squire Western put up his horses when he came to town, stood just east of Apsley House, "on the site of what is now the pavement opposite Lord Willoughby's."

‡ The Duke of Queensberry's house was afterwards 138 and 139 Piccadilly.

into Berkeley Square, on the left." * In these last lines Mr. Cunningham anticipates our story, for in 1774, Walpole had not yet taken up his residence in Berkeley Square.

* Letters by Cunningham, 1857-9, ix, xx—xxi.

CHAPTER IX.

Occupations and correspondence; literary work; Jephson and the stage; “Nature will Prevail”; issues from the Strawberry Press; fourth volume of the “Anecdotes of Painting”; the Beauclerk Tower and Lady Di.; George, third Earl of Orford; sale of the Houghton pictures; moves to Berkeley Square; last visit to Madame du Deffand; her death; themes for letters; death of Sir Horace Mann; Pinkerton, Madame de Genlis, Miss Burney, Hannah More; Mary and Agnes Berry; their residence at Twickenham; becomes fourth Earl of Orford; “Epitaphium vivi Auctoris”; the Berrys again; death of Marshal Conway; last letter to Lady Ossory; dies at Berkeley Square, 2 March, 1797; his fortune and will; the fate of Strawberry.

IX.

AFTER the completion of Strawberry Hill and the printing of the Catalogue, Walpole's life grows comparatively barren of events. There are still four volumes of his Correspondence, but they take upon them more and more the nature of nouvelles à la main, and are less fruitful in personal traits. Between his books and his prints, his time passes agreeably, "but will not do to relate." Indeed, from this period until his death in 1797, the most notable occurrences in his history are his friendship with the Miss Berrys in 1787-8, and his belated accession to the Earldom of Orford. Both at Strawberry and Arlington Street, his increasing years and his persistent malady condemn him more and more to seclusion and retirement. He is most at Strawberry, despite its dampness, for in the country he holds "old useless people ought to live." "If you were not to be in London," he tells Lady Ossory in April, 1774, "the spring advances so charmingly, I think I should scarce go thither. One is frightened with the inundation of breakfasts and balls that are coming on. Every one is engaged to everybody for the next three weeks, and if one must hunt for a needle, I had rather look for it in a bottle of hay in the country than in a crowd." "By age and situation," he writes from Strawberry in September, "at this time of the year I live with nothing but old women. They do very well for me who have little choice left, and who rather prefer common nonsense to wise nonsense — the only difference I know between old women and old men. I am out of all politics, and never think of elections, which I think I should hate even if I loved politics ; just as if I loved tapestry I do not think I could talk over the manufacture of worsteds. Books I have almost done with too ; at least, read only such as nobody else would read. In short, my way of life is too insipid to entertain anybody but myself, and though I am always employed, I must own I think I have given up every thing in the world only to be busy about the most arrant trifles.” His London life was not greatly different. “How should I see or know anything?” he says a year later, apologising for his dearth of news. “I seldom stir out of my house [at Arlington Street] before seven in the evening, see very few persons, and go to fewer places, make no new acquaintance, and have seen most of my old wear out. Loo at Princess Amelie’s, loo at Lady Hertford’s, are the capital events of my history, and a Sunday alone, at Strawberry, my chief entertainment. All this is far from gay ; but as it neither gives me ennui, nor lowers my spirits, it is not uncomfortable, and I prefer it to being déplacé in younger company.” Such is his account of his life in 1774–5, when he is nearing sixty, and it probably represents it with sufficient accuracy. But a trifling incident easily stirs him into unwonted vivacity. While he is protesting that he has nothing to say, his letters grow under his pen, and, almost as a necessary consequence of his leisure, they become more frequent and more copious. In the edition of Cunningham, up to September, 1774, they number fourteen hundred and fifty. Speaking roughly, this represents a period of nearly forty years. During the two-and-twenty years that remained to him, he managed to swell them by what was, proportionately, a far greater number. The last letter given by Cunningham is marked 2665, and this enumeration does not include a good many letters and fragments of letters belonging to this later period, which were published in 1865 in Miss Berry's Journals and Correspondence. Nevertheless, as stated above, they more and more assume what he somewhere calls "their proper character of newspapers."

During the remainder of his life, they were his chief occupation, and his gout was seldom so severe but that he could make shift to scribble a line to his favourite correspondents, calling in his printer Kirgate in cases of extremity. Of literature generally he professed to have taken final leave. "I no longer care about fame," he tells Mason in 1774: "I have done being an author." Nevertheless, the Short Notes piously chronicle the production of more than one trifle, which are reprinted in his Works. When, in the above year, shortly after Goldsmith's death, Lord Chesterfield published his letters to his son, Walpole began a parody of that famous performance in a Series of Letters from a Mother to her Daughter, with the general title of the Whole Duty of Woman. He grew tired of the idea too soon to enable us to judge what his success might have been with a subject which, in his hands, should have been diverting as a satire, for, although he was a warm admirer of Chesterfield's parts, as he had shown in his character of him in the Royal and Noble Authors, he was thoroughly aware of the artificiality of what he calls his "impertinent institutes of education."* Another work of this year was a reply to some remarks by Mr. Masters in the Archæologia upon the old subject of the His-

* It was his good sense rather than his inclination that made him condemn one with whom he had many points of sympathy. Speaking of the quarrel of Johnson and Chesterfield, he says, "The friendly patronage [i. e., of the earl] was returned with ungrateful rudeness by the proud pedant; and men smiled, without being surprised, at seeing a bear worry his dancing master."

toric Doubts, which calls for no further notice. But early in 1775 he was persuaded into writing an epilogue for the Braganza of Captain Robert Jephson, a maiden tragedy of the Venice Preserved order which was produced at Drury Lane in February of that year with considerable success. In a correspondence which ensued with the author, Walpole delivered himself of his views on tragedy for the benefit of Mr. Jephson, who acted upon them, but not (as his Mentor thought) with conspicuous success, in his next attempt, the Law of Lombardy. Jephson's third play, however, the Count of Narbonne, which was well received in 1781, had a natural claim upon Walpole's good opinion, since it was based upon the Castle of Otranto. Besides the above letters on tragedy, Walpole wrote, "in 1775 and 1776," a rather longer paper on comedy, which is printed with them in the second volume of his works. He held, as he says, "a good comedy, the chef d'œuvre of human genius," and it is manifest that his keenest sympathies were on the side of comic art. His remarks upon Congreve are full of just appreciation. Yet, although he mentions the School for Scandal (which by the way shows that he must have written rather later than the dates given above), he makes no reference to the most recent development, in She Stoops to Conquer, of the school of humour and character, and he seems rather to pose as the advocate of that genteel or sentimental comedy which Foote and Goldsmith and Sheridan had striven to drive from the English stage. When his prejudices are aroused he is seldom a safe guide, and in addition to his personal contempt for Goldsmith,* that writer had irritated him by his reference to the Albemarle Street Club, to which many of his friends belonged. It was an additional offence that the "Miss Biddy (originally Miss Rachael) Buckskin" of the comedy was said to stand for Mrs. Rachael Lloyd, long housekeeper at Kensington Palace, and a member of the club well known both to himself and to Madame du Deffand.

In the second of the letters to Mr. Jephson, Walpole refers to his own efforts at comedy, and implies that he had made attempts in this direction even before the date of The Mysterious Mother. He had certainly the wit, and much of the gift of direct expression, which comedy requires. But nothing of these earlier essays appears to have survived, and the only dramatic effort included among his Works (his tragedy excepted) is the little piece entitled Nature will Prevail, which, with its fairy machinery, has something of the character of such earlier productions of Mr. W. S. Gilbert as the Palace of Truth. This he wrote in 1773, and according to the Short Notes, sent it anonymously to the elder Colman, then manager of Covent Garden. Colman (he says) was much pleased with it, but regarding it as too short for a farce, wished to have it enlarged. This, however, its author thought too much trouble "for so slight and extempore a performance." Five years after, it was produced at the little theatre in the Hay-market, and being admirably acted — says the Biographia Dramatica — met with considerable applause. But it is obviously one of those works to which the verdict of Goldsmith's critic, that it would have been better if the author had taken more pains, may judiciously be applied. It is more like a sketch for a farce than a farce itself, and it is not finished enough for a proverbe. Yet the dialogue is in parts so good that one almost regrets the inability of the author to nerve himself for an enterprise de longue haleine.

* "Silly Dr. Goldsmith"—he calls him to Cole in April, 1773. "Goldsmith was an idiot; with once or twice a fit of parts"—he says again to Mason in October, 1776.

Between 1774 and 1780 the Strawberry Hill Press still now and then showed signs of vitality. In 1775, it printed as a loose sheet some verses by Charles James Fox, celebrating, as Amoret, that lover of the Whigs, the beautiful Mrs. Crewe, and three hundred copies of an Eclogue by Mr. Fitzpatrick, entitled Dorinda, which contains the couplet,—

“And oh! what bliss, when each alike is pleased,
The hand that squeezes, and the hand that's squeezed.”

These were followed, in 1778, by the Sleep Walker, a comedy from the French of Madame du Deffand’s friend Pont de Veyle, translated by Lady Craven, afterwards Margravine of Anspach, and played for a charitable purpose at Newbury. A year later came the vindication of his conduct to Chatterton, already mentioned in Chapter vii; and after this a sheet of verse by Mr. Charles Miller to Lady Horatia Waldegrave,* a daughter of the

* One of the three beautiful sisters painted by Reynolds,—Laura, afterwards Viscountess

Chewton; Maria, afterwards Countess of Euston; and Horatia, who married Captain Hugh

Duchess of Gloucester by her first husband. The last work of any importance was the fourth volume of the Anecdotes of Painting, which had been printed as far back as 1770, but was not issued until Oct., 1780. This delay, the Advertisement informs us, arose "from motives of tenderness." The author was "unwilling (he says) to utter even gentle censures, which might wound the affections, or offend the prejudices, of those related to the persons whom truth forbade him to commend beyond their merits."* But despite his unwillingness to "dispense universal panegyric," and the limitation of his theme to living professors, he manages, in the same advertisement, to distribute a fair amount of praise to some of his particular friends. Of H. W. Bunbury, the husband of Goldsmith's "Little Comedy," he says that he is the "second Hogarth," and the "first imitator who ever fully equalled his original," which is sheer extravagance. He Conway. "Sir Joshua Reynolds gets avaricious in his old age. My picture of the young ladies Waldegrave is doubtless very fine and graceful; but it cost me 800 guineas" (Walpoliana, ii, 157).

* He was not successful as regards Hogarth, whose widow was sorely and justly wounded by his censure of Sigismunda, which is said to have been a portrait of herself. The picture is now in the National Gallery.

lauds the miniature copying of Lady Lucan, as almost depreciating the “exquisite works” of the artists she copies—to wit, Cooper and the Olivers; and he speaks of Lady Di. Beauclerk’s drawings as “not only inspired by Shakespeare’s insight into nature, but by the graces and taste of Grecian artists.” After this, the comparison of Mrs. Damer with Bernini seems almost tame. Yet her works “from the life are not inferior to the antique, and those . . . were not more like.” One can scarcely blame Walpole severely for this hearty backing of the friends who had added so much to the attractions of his Gothic castle; but the value of his criticisms, in many other instances sound enough, is certainly impaired by his loyalty to the old-new practice of “log-rolling.”

Lady Di. Beauclerk, whose illustrations to Dryden’s Fables are still a frequent item in second-hand catalogues, has a personal connection with Strawberry through the curious little closet bearing her name, which, with the assistance of Mr. Essex, a Gothic architect from Cambridge, Walpole in 1776–8 managed to tuck in between the Cabinet and the Round Tower. It was built on purpose to hold the

"seven incomparable drawings" executed in a fortnight, which Her Ladyship prepared to illustrate The Mysterious Mother. These were the designs to which he refers in the Anecdotes of Painting; and, in a letter to Mann, says could not be surpassed by Guido and Salvator Rosa. They were hung on Indian blue damask, and Clive's friend, Miss Pope, the actress, when she dined at Strawberry, was affected by them to such a degree that she shed tears, although she did not know the story, an anecdote which may be regarded either as a genuine compliment to Lady Di., or a merely histrionic tribute to her entertainer. "The drawings," Walpole says, "do not shock and disgust, like their original, the tragedy," but they were not to be shown to the profane. They were, nevertheless, probably exhibited pretty freely, as a copy of the play, bound in blue leather to match the hangings, was always kept in a drawer of one of the tables for the purpose of explaining them.* Walpole afterwards added one or two curiosities it, these Beauclerk drawings can be looked on only with disgust and contempt." But she praises the gipsies hereafter mentioned as having been copied by Agnes Berry.

* Miss Hawkins (Anecdotes, etc., 1822, p. 103) did not think highly of these performances:—"Unless the proportions of the human figure are of no importance in drawing

to this closet. It contained, according to the last edition of the Catalogue, a head in basalt of Jupiter Serapis, and a book of Psalms illuminated by Giulio Clovio, the latter purchased for £168, at the Duchess of Portland's sale in 1786. There was also a portrait by Powell, after Reynolds, of Lady Di. herself, who lived for some time at Twickenham in a house now known as Little Marble Hill, many of the rooms of which she decorated with her own performances. These were apparently the efforts which prompted the already mentioned postscript to the Parish Register of Twickenham :—

“ Here Genius in a later hour
Selected its sequester'd bower,
And threw around the verdant room
The blushing lilac's chill perfume.
So loose is flung such bold festoon—
Each bough so breathes the touch of noon—
The happy pencil so deceives,
That Flora, doubly jealous, cries
‘ The work's not mine— yet, trust these eyes, ‘ T is my own Zephyr waves the leaves.’ ”*

Mention has been made of the intermittent attacks of insanity to which Walpole's nephew, the third Earl of Orford, was subject. At the beginning of 1774, he had returned to his senses, and his uncle, on whom fell the chief cares of his affairs during his illnesses, was, for a brief period, freed from the irksome strain of an uncongenial and a thankless duty. But in April, 1777, Lord Orford's malady broke out again with redoubled violence. In August, he was still fluctuating "between violence and stupidity"; but in March, 1778, a lucid interval had once more been reached, and Walpole was relieved of the care of his person. Of his affairs he had declined to take care, as His Lordship had employed a lawyer of whom Walpole had a bad opinion. "He has resumed the entire dominion of himself," says a letter to Mann in April, "and is gone into the country, and intends to command the militia." One of the earliest results of this "entire dominion" was a step which filled his relative with the keenest distress. He offered the famous Houghton collection of pictures to Catherine of Russia—"the most signal mortification to my idolatry for my father's memory, that it could receive," he says to Lady Ossory. By August, 1779, the sale was completed. "The sum stipulated," he tells Mann, "is forty or forty-five thousand pounds,* I neither know nor care which; nor whether the picture merchant ever receives the whole sum, which probably he will not do, as I hear it is to be discharged at three payments—a miserable bargain for a mighty empress!" . . . Well! adieu to Houghton! about its mad master I shall never trouble myself more. . . . Since he has stript Houghton of its glory, I do not care a straw what he does with the stone or the acres!"†

* See chapter vi.

Not very long after the date of the above letter Walpole made what was, for him, an important change of residence. The lease of his house in Arlington Street running out, he fixed upon a larger one in the then very fashionable district of Berkeley Square. The house he selected, now numbered 11, was then 40, and he had commenced negotiations for its purchase as early as November, 1777, when, he tells Lady Ossory, he had come to town to take possession. But difficulties arose over the sale, and he found himself involved in a Chancery suit. He was

* The exact sum was £40,555. Cipriani and West were the valuers. Most of the family portraits were reserved; but so many of the pictures were presents that it is not easy to estimate the actual profit over their first cost to the original owner.

† Walpole to Mann, 4 Aug., 1779.

too adroit, however, to allow this to degenerate into an additional annoyance, and managed (by his own account) to turn what promised to be a tedious course of litigation into a combat of courtesy. Ultimately, in July, 1779, he had won his cause, and was hurrying from Strawberry to pay his purchase money and close the bargain. Two months later, he is moving in, and is delighted with his acquisition. He would not change his two pretty mansions for any in England, he says. On the 14th October, he took formal possession, upon which day—"his inauguration day"—he dates his first letter "Berkeley Square." "It is seeming to take a new lease of life," he tells Mason. "I was born in Arlington Street, lived there about fourteen years, returned thither, and passed thirty-seven more; but I have sober monitors that warn me not to delude myself." He had still a decade and a half before him.

Little more than twelve months after he had settled down in his new abode, he lost the faithful correspondent at Paris, to whom, for the space of fifteen years, he had written nearly once a week. By 1774, he had become somewhat nervous about this accumulated correspondence in a language not his own. For an Englishman, his French was good, and, as might be expected of anything he wrote, characteristic and vivacious. But, almost of necessity, it contained many minor faults of phraseology and arrangement, besides abounding in personal anecdote; and he became apprehensive lest, after Madame du Deffand's death, his utterances should fall into alien hands. General Conway, who visited Paris in October, 1774, had therefore been charged to beg for their return—a request which seems at first to have been met by the reply on the lady's part that sufficient precautions had already been taken for ensuring their restoration. Ultimately, however, they were handed to Conway.* It was in all probability under a sense of this concession that Walpole once more risked a tedious journey to visit his blind friend. In the following year he went to Paris, to find her, as usual, impatiently expecting his arrival. She sat with him until half past two, and before his eyes

* According to a note in the selection from Madame du Deffand's Correspondence with Walpole, published in 1810, iii, 44, these letters were at that date extant. But all the subsequent letters were burnt by her at Walpole's earnest desire—those only excepted which she received during the last year of her life, and these, also, were sent back when she died.

were open again he had a letter from her. "Her soul is immortal, and forces her body to keep it company." A little later he complains that he never gets to bed from her suppers before two or three o'clock. "In short," he says, "I need have the activity of a squirrel, and the strength of a Hercules, to go through my labours—not to count how many démétés I have had to raccoomode and how many mémoires to present against Tonton,* who grows the greater favourite the more people he devours." But Tonton's mistress is more worth visiting than ever, he tells Selwyn, and she is apparently as tireless as ever. "Madame du Deffand and I (says another letter) set out last Sunday at seven in the evening, to go fifteen miles to a ball, and came back after supper; and another night, because it was but one in the morning

* Tonton was a snappish little dog of Madame du Deffand which afterwards passed to Walpole, and which, when in its mistress's company, must have been extremely objectionable. In 1778, some of her friends presented her with Tonton's portrait and the last volumes of her favourite Voltaire, adding the following epigram by the Chevalier de Boufflers:—

"Vous les trouvez tous deux charmans, Nous les trouvons tous deux mordans;
Voilà la ressemblance:
L'un ne mord que ses ennemis,
Et l'autre mord tous vos amis; Voilà la différence."

when she brought me home, she ordered the coachman to make the tour of the Quais, and drive gently because it was so early." At last, on the twelfth of October, he tears himself away, to be followed almost immediately by a letter of farewell. Here it is:—

ADIEU, ce mot est bien triste; souvenez-vous que vous laissez ici la personne dont vous êtes le plus aimé, et dont le bonheur et le malheur consistent dans ce que vous pensez pour elle. Donnez-moi de vos nouvelles le plus tôt qu'il sera possible.

Je me porte bien, j'ai un peu dormi, ma nuit n'est pas finie; je serai très-exacte au régime, et j'aurai soin de moi puisque vous vous y intéressez.

The correspondence thus resumed was continued for five years more. Walpole does not seem to have visited Paris again, and the references to Madame du Deffand in his general correspondence are not very frequent. Towards the middle of 1780, her life was plainly closing in. In July and August, she complained of being more than usually languid, and in a letter of the 22nd of the latter month intimates that it may be her last, as dictation grows painful to her. "Ne vous devant revoir de ma vie"—she says pathetically—"je n'ai rien à regretter."

From this time she kept her bed, and in September Walpole tells Lady Ossory that he is trembling at every letter he gets from Paris. "My dear old friend, I fear, is going! . . . To have struggled twenty days at eighty-four shows such stamina that I have not totally lost hopes." On the 24th, however, after a lethargy of several days, she died quietly "without effort or struggle." "Elle a eu la mort la plus douce"—says her faithful and attached secretary Wiart—"quoique la maladie ait été longue." She was buried, at her own wish, in the parish church of St. Sulpice. By her will she made the Marquis d'Aulan her heir. Long since, she had wished Walpole to accept this character. Thereupon he had threatened that he would never set foot in Paris again if she carried out her intention; and it was abandoned. But she left him the whole of her manuscripts, letters, and books.

As his own letters to her have not been printed, her death makes no difference in the amount of his correspondence. The war with the American Colonies, of which he foresaw the disastrous results, and the course of which he follows with the greatest keenness to Mann, fully absorbs as much of his time as he can spare from the vagaries of the Duchess of Kingston and the doings of the Duchess of Gloucester. Not many months before Madame du Deffand died had occurred the famous Gordon Riots, which, as he was in London most of the time, naturally occupy his pen. It was General Conway who, as the author of Barnaby Rudge has not forgotten, so effectively remonstrated with Lord George upon the occasion of the visit of the mob to the House of Commons; and four days later Walpole chronicles from Berkeley Square the events of the terrible "Black Wednesday." From the roof of Gloucester House he sees the blazing prisons—a sight he shall not soon forget. Other subjects for which one dips in the lucky bag of his records are the defence of Gibraltar, the trial of Warren Hastings, the loss of the Royal George. But it is generally in the minor chronicle that he is most diverting. The last bon mot of George Selwyn or Lady Townshend, the newest "royal pregnancy," the details of court ceremonial, the most recent addition to Strawberry, the endless stream of anecdote and tittle tattle which runs dimpling all the way—these are the themes he loves best — this is the element in which his easy persiflage delights to display itself. He is, above all, a rieur. About his serious passages there is generally a false ring, but never when he pours out the gossip that he loves, and of which he has so inexhaustible a supply. “I can sit and amuse myself with my own memory,” he says to Mann in February, 1785, “and yet find new stores at every audience that I give to it. Then, for private episodes [he has been speaking of his knowledge of public events], varieties of characters, political intrigues, literary anecdotes, &c, the profusion I remember is endless; in short, when I reflect on all that I have seen, heard, read, written, the many idle hours I have passed, the nights I have wasted playing at faro, the weeks, nay months, I have spent in pain, you will not wonder that I almost think I have, like Pythagoras, been Panthoides Euphorbus, and have retained one memory in at least two bodies.”

He was sixty-eight when he wrote the above letter. Mann was eighty-four, and the long correspondence — a correspondence “not to be paralleled in the annals of the Post Office” — was drawing to a close. “What Orestes and Pylades ever wrote to each other for four and forty years without meeting”—Walpole asks. In June, 1786, however, the last letter of the eight hundred and nine specimens printed by Cunningham was despatched to Florence.* In the following November, Mann died, after a prolonged illness. He had never visited England, nor had Walpole set eyes upon him since he had left him at Florence in May, 1741. His death followed hard upon that of another faithful friend (whose gifts, perhaps, hardly lay in the epistolary line), bustling, kindly Kitty Clive. Her cheerful, ruddy face, “all sun and vermillion,” set peacefully in December, 1785, leaving Cliveden vacant, not, as we shall see, for long. Earlier still had departed another old ally, Cole, the antiquary, and the lapse of time had in other ways contracted Walpole’s circle. In 1781, Lady Orford had ended her erratic career at Pisa, leaving her son a fortune so considerable as to make his uncle regret vaguely that the sale of the Houghton pictures had not been delayed for a few months longer. Three years later, she was followed by her brother-in-law, Sir Edward Walpole, an occurrence which had the effect of leaving between Horace Walpole and his father's title nothing but his lunatic and childless nephew.

* Walpole, as in the case of Madame du Deffand, had taken the precaution of getting back his letters, and at his friend’s death, not more than a dozen of them were still in Mann’s possession. According to Cunningham (Corr., ix, xv), Mann’s letters to Walpole are “absolutely unreadable.”

If his relatives and friends were falling away, however, their places—the places of the friends at least—were speedily filled again; and, as a general rule, most of his male favourites were replaced by women. Pinkerton, the antiquary, who afterwards published the Walpoliana, is one of the exceptions; and several of Walpole's letters to him are contained in that book, and in the volumes of Pinkerton's own correspondence published by Dawson Turner in 1830. But Walpole's appetite for correspondence of the purely literary kind had somewhat slackened in his old age, and it was to the other sex that he turned for sympathy and solace. He liked them best; his style suited them; and he wrote to them with most ease. In 1785, he was visited at Strawberry by Madame de Genlis, who arrived with her friend Miss Wilkes and the famous Pamela, afterwards Lady Edward Fitzgerald. Madame de Genlis at this date was nearing forty, and had lost much of her good looks. But Walpole seems to have found her less précieuse and affected than he had anticipated, and she was, for the nonce, unaccompanied by the inevitable harp. A later visit was from Dr. Burney and his daughter Fanny, "Evelina-Cecilia" Walpole calls her, a young lady for whose good sense and modesty he expresses a genuine admiration. Miss Burney had not as yet entered upon that court bondage which was to be so little to her advantage. Another and more intimate acquaintanceship of this period was with Miss Burney's friend, Hannah More. Hannah More ultimately became one of Walpole's correspondents, although scarcely "so corresponding" as he wished; and they met frequently in society when she visited London. On her side, she seems to have been wholly fascinated by his wit and conversational powers; he, on his, was attracted by her mixed puritanism and vivacity. He writes to her as "Saint Hannah"; and she, in return, sighs plaintively over his lack of religion. Yet (she adds) she "must do him the justice to say, that except the delight he has in teasing me for what he calls over-strictness, I have never heard a sentence from him which savoured of infidelity.* He evidently took a great interest in her works, and indeed printed at his press one of her poems, "Bonner's Ghost." His friendship for her endured for the remainder of his life, and not long before his death he presented her with a richly bound copy of Bishop Wilson's Bible with a complimentary inscription which may be read in the second volume of her Life and Correspondence.

It was, however, neither the author of Evelina nor the author of The Manners of the Great who was destined to fill the void created by the death of Madame du Deffand. In the winter of 1787-8, he had first seen, and a year later he made the formal acquaintance of, "two young ladies of the name of Berry." They had a story. Their father, at this time a widower, had married for love, and had afterwards been supplanted in the good graces of a rich uncle by a younger brother who had the generosity to allow him an annuity of a thousand a year.

* He is not explicit as to his creed. "Atheism I dislike"—he said to Pinkerton. "It is gloomy, uncomfortable; and, in my eye, unnatural and irrational. It certainly requires more credulity to believe that there is no God, than to believe that there is" (Walpoliana, i, 75-6). But Pinkerton must be taken with caution.

In 1783, Mr. Berry had taken his daughters abroad to Holland, Switzerland, and Italy, whence, in June, 1785, they had returned, being then highly cultivated and attractive young women of two-and-twenty and one-and-twenty respectively. Three years later, Walpole met them for the second time at the house of a Lady Herries, the wife of a banker in St. James's Street. The first time he saw them he "would not be acquainted with them having heard so much in their praise that he concluded they would be all pretension." But on the second occasion, "in a very small company," he sat next the elder, Mary, "and found her an angel both inside and out." "Her face," he tells Lady Ossory—"is formed for a sentimental novel, but it is ten times fitter for a fifty times better thing, genteel comedy." The other sister was speedily discovered to be nearly as charming. "They are exceedingly sensible, entirely natural and unaffected, frank, and being qualified to talk on any subject, nothing is so easy and agreeable as their conversation, nor more apposite than their answers and observations. The eldest, I discovered by chance, understands Latin, and is a perfect Frenchwoman in her language. The younger draws charmingly, and has copied admirably Lady Di.'s gipsies,* which I lent, though for the first time of her attempting colours. They are of pleasing figures; Mary, the eldest, sweet, with fine dark eyes, that are very lively when she speaks, with a symmetry of face that is the more interesting from being pale; Agnes, the younger, has an agreeable sensible countenance hardly to be called handsome, but almost. She is less animated than Mary, but seems, out of deference to her sister, to speak seldom, for they dote on each other, and Mary is always praising her sister's talents. I must even tell you they dress within the bounds of fashion, though fashionably; but without the excrescences and balconies with which modern hoydens overwhelm and barricade their persons. In short, good sense, information, simplicity, and ease characterise the Berrys; and this is not particularly mine, who am apt to be prejudiced, but the universal voice of all who know them."†

"This delightful family," he goes on to say,

* This (we are told) was Lady Di.'s chef d'œuvre. It represented "Gipsies telling a country maiden her fortune at the entrance of a beech-wood," and hung in the Red Bedchamber at Strawberry.

† Walpole to Lady Ossory, 11 Oct., 1788.

"comes to me almost every Sunday evening." (They were at the time living on Twickenham Common.) Of the father not much is recorded beyond the fact that he was "a little merry man with a round face," and (as his eldest daughter reports) "an odd inherent easiness in his disposition," who seems to have been perfectly contented in his modest and unobtrusive character of paternal appendage to the favourites. Walpole's attachment to his new friends grew rapidly. Only a few days after the date of the foregoing letter, Mr. Kirgate's press was versifying in their honour, and they themselves were already "his two Straw Berries" whose praises he sang to all his friends. He delighted in devising new titles for them — they were his "twin wives," his "dear Both," his "Amours." For them in this year he began writing the charming little volume of Reminiscences of the Courts of George the 1st and 2nd, and in December, 1789, he dedicated to them his Catalogue of Strawberry Hill. It was not long before he had secured them a home at Teddington, and finally, when, in 1791, Cliveden became vacant, he prevailed upon them to become his neighbours. He afterwards bequeathed the house to them, and for many years after his death, it was their summer residence. On both sides the acquaintanceship was advantageous. His friendship at once introduced them to the best and most accomplished fashionable society of their day, while the charm of their “company, conversation and talents” must have inexpressibly sweetened and softened what, on his part, had begun to grow more and more a solitary, joyless, and painful old age.

His establishment of his “wives” in his immediate vicinity was not, however, accomplished without difficulty. For a moment some ill-natured newspaper gossip, which attributed the attachment of the Berry family to interested motives, so justly aroused the indignation of the elder sister that the whole arrangement threatened to collapse. But the slight estrangement thus caused soon passed away; and at the close of 1791, they took up their abode in Mrs. Clive’s old house, now doubly honoured. On the 5th of the December in the same year, “after a new fit of frenzy,” Walpole’s nephew died, and he became fourth Earl of Orford. The new dignity was by no means a welcome one, and scarcely compensated for the cares which it entailed. “A small estate, loaded with debt, and of which I do not understand the management, and am too old to learn; a source of law suits amongst my near relations, though not affecting me; endless conversations with lawyers, and packets of letters to read every day and answer,—all this weight of new business is too much for the rag of life that yet hangs about me, and was preceded by three weeks of anxiety about my unfortunate nephew, and a daily correspondence with physicians and mad-doctors, falling upon me when I had been out of order ever since July.* “For the other empty metamorphosis,” he writes to Hannah More, “that has happened to the outward man, you do me justice in concluding that it can do nothing but tease me; it is being called names in one’s old age. I had rather be my Lord Mayor, for then I should keep the nickname but a year; and mine I may retain a little longer, not that at seventy-five I reckon on becoming my Lord Methusalem.” For some time he could scarcely bring himself to use his new signature, and occasionally varied it by describing himself as “The uncle of the late Earl of

* Walpole to Pinkerton, 26 Dec., 1791.

Orford." In 1792, he delivered himself of the following Epitaphium vivi Auctoris:

"An estate and an earldom at seventy-four!
Had I sought them or wished them 't would add one fear more,
That of making a countess when almost four score.
But Fortune, who scatters her gifts out of season,
Though unkind to my limbs, has still left me my reason,
And whether she lowers or lifts me, I'll try,
In the plain simple style I have lived in, to die:
For ambition too humble, for manners too high."

The last line seems like another of the many echoes of Goldsmith's Retaliation. As for the fear indicated in the third, it is hinted that this at one time bade fair to be something more than a poetical apprehension. If we are to credit a tradition handed down by Lord Lansdowne, he had been willing to go through the form of marriage with either of the Berrys, merely to secure their society, and to enrich them, as he had the power of charging the Orford estate with a jointure of £2000 per annum. But this can only have been a passing thought at some moment when their absence, in Italy or elsewhere, left him more sensitive to the loss of their gracious and stimulating presence. He himself was far too keenly alive to ridicule, and too much in bondage to les bienséances, to take a step which could scarcely escape ill-natured comment, and Mary Berry, who would certainly have been his preference, was not only as fully alive as was he to the shafts of the censorious, but, during the greater part of her acquaintance-ship with him, was, apparently with his know-ledge, warmly attached to a certain good-looking General O'Hara, who, a year before Walpole's death, in November, 1796, definitely proposed. He had just been appointed Governor of Gib-raltar, and he wished Miss Berry to marry him at once and go out with him. This, "out of consideration for others," she declined to do. A few months later the engagement was broken off, and she never again saw her soldier admirer. Whether Lord Orford's comfort went for anything in this adjournment of her hap-piness, does not clearly appear; but it is only reasonable to suppose that his tenacious desire for her companionship had its influence in a decision which, however much it may have been for the best (and there were those of her friends who regarded it as a providential escape), was nevertheless a lifelong source of regret to her-self. When, in 1802, she heard suddenly at the Opera of O'Hara's death, she fell senseless to the floor.

The “late Horace Walpole” never took his seat in the House of Lords. He continued, as before, to divide his time between Berkeley Square and Strawberry, to eulogise his “wives” to Lady Ossory, and to watch life from his beloved Blue Room. Now and then he did the rare honours of his home to a distinguished guest—in 1793, it was the Duchess of York, in 1795, Queen Charlotte herself. In the latter year died his old friend Conway, by this time a Field-Marshal, and it was evident at the close of 1796 that his faithful correspondent would not long survive him. His ailments had increased, and in the following January, he wrote his last letter to Lady Ossory:—

Jan. 15, 1797.

MY DEAR MADAM:—

You distress me infinitely by showing my idle notes, which I cannot conceive can amuse anybody. My old-fashioned breeding impels me every now and then to reply to the letters you honour me with writing, but in truth very unwillingly, for I seldom can have anything particular to say; I scarce go out of my own house, and then only to two or three very private places, where I see nobody that really knows anything, and what I learn comes from Newspapers, that collect intelligence from coffee-houses, consequently what I neither believe nor report. At home I see only a few charitable elders, except about four-score nephews and nieces of various ages, who are each brought to me about once a-year, to stare at me as the Methusalem of the family, and they can only speak of their own contemporaries, which interest me no more than if they talked of their dolls, or bats and balls. Must not the result of all this, Madam, make me a very entertaining correspondent? And can such letters be worth showing? or can I have any spirit when so old, and reduced to dictate?

Oh! my good Madam, dispense with me from such a task, and think how it must add to it to apprehend such letters being shown. Pray send me no more such laurels, which I desire no more than their leaves when decked with a scrap of tinsel, and stuck on twelfth-cakes that lie on the shop-boards of pastry-cooks at Christmas. I shall be quite content with a sprig of rosemary thrown after me, when the parson of the parish commits my dust to dust. Till then, pray, Madam, accept the resignation of your

Ancient servant,
ORFORD.

Six weeks after the date of the above letter, he died at his house in Berkeley Square, to which he had been moved at the close of the previous year. During the last weeks of his life, he suffered from a cruel lapse of memory which led him to suppose himself neglected even by those who had but just quitted him. He sank gradually and expired without pain on the 2nd March, 1797, being then in his eightieth year. He was buried at the family seat of Houghton.

His fortune, over and above his leases, amounted to ninety-one thousand pounds. To each of the Miss Berrys, he left the sum of £4000 for their lives, together with the house and garden of "Little Strawberry" (Cliveden), the long meadow in front of it, and all the furniture. He also bequeathed to them and to their father his printed works and his manuscripts, with discretionary power to publish. It was understood that the real editorship was to fall on the elder sister, who forthwith devoted herself to her task. The result was the edition, in five quarto volumes, of Lord Orford's Works, so often referred to during the progress of these pages, which appeared in 1798. They were entirely due to her unremitting care, her father's share being confined to a sentence in the preface, in which she is eulogised.*

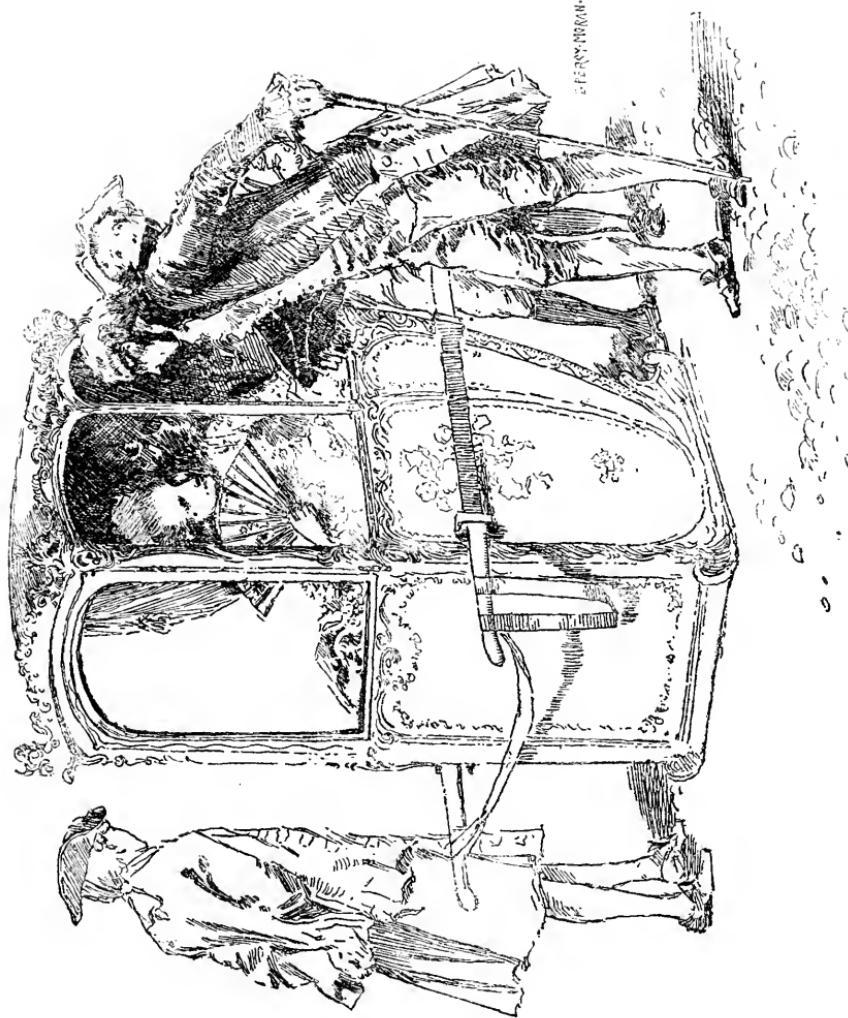

Strawberry Hill passed to Mrs. Damer for life, together with £2000 to keep it in repair. After living in it for some years, she resigned it, in 1811, to the Countess Dowager of Waldegrave, in whom the remainder in fee was

* Mary Berry died Nov., 1852; Agnes Berry, Jan., 1852. They were buried in one grave in Peter-sham churchyard, "amidst scenes" —says the inscription—"which in life they had frequented and loved."

vested. It subsequently passed to George, seventh Earl Waldegrave, who sold its contents in 1842. At his death, in 1846, he left it to his widow Frances, Countess of Waldegrave, who subsequently married the Rt. Hon. Chichester Fortescue, now Lord Carlingford. Lady Waldegrave died in 1879; but she had greatly added to and extended the original building, besides restoring many of the objects by which it had been decorated in Walpole's day.

CHAPTER X.

Macaulay on Walpole ; effect of the Edinburgh essay ; Macaulay and Mary Berry ; portraits of Walpole ; Miss Hawkins's description ; Pinkerton's rainy day at Strawberry ; Walpole's character as a man ; as a virtuoso ; as a politician ; as an author and letter-writer.

X.

WHEN, in October, 1833, Lord (then Mr.) Macaulay completed for the Edinburgh his review of Lord Dover's edition of Walpole's letters to Sir Horace Mann, he had apparently performed to his entire satisfaction the operation known, in the workmanlike vocabulary of the time, as "dusting the jacket" of his unfortunate reviewee. "I was up at four this morning to put the last touch to it," he tells his sister Hannah. "I often differ with the majority about other people's writings, and still oftener about my own; and therefore I may very likely be mistaken; but I think that this article will be a hit. . . . Nothing ever cost me more pains than the first half; I never wrote anything so flowingly as the latter half; and I like the latter half the best. [The latter half, it should be stated, was a rapid and very brilliant sketch of Sir Robert Walpole; the earlier, which cost so much labour, was the portrait of Sir Robert's youngest son.] I have laid it on Walpole [i. e., Horace Walpole] so unsparingly," he goes on to say, "that I shall not be surprised if Miss Berry should cut me. . . . Neither am I sure that Lord and Lady Holland will be well pleased." *

His later letters show him to have been a true prophet. Macvey Napier, then the editor of the "Blue and Yellow," was enthusiastic, praising the article "in terms absolutely extravagant." "He says that it is the best that I ever wrote," the critic tells his favourite correspondent, a statement which at this date must be qualified by the fact that he penned some of his most famous essays subsequent to its appearance. On the other hand, Miss Berry resented the review so much that Sir Stratford Canning advised its author not to go near her. But apparently her anger was soon dispelled, for the same letter which makes this announcement relates that she was already appeased. Lady Holland, too, was "in a rage," though with what part of the article does not transpire, while her good-natured husband told Macaulay that he quite agreed with him, but that they had better not discuss the subject. Lady Holland's irritation was probably prompted by her intimacy with the Waldegrave family, to whom the letters edited by Lord Dover belonged, and for whose benefit they were published. But, as Macaulay said justly, his article was surely not calculated to injure the sale of the book. Her imperious ladyship's displeasure, however, like that of Miss Berry, was of brief duration. Macaulay was too necessary to her réunions to be long exiled from her little court.

* Trevelyan's Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay, ch. v.

Among those who occupy themselves in such enquiries, it has been matter for speculation what particular grudge Macaulay could have cherished against Horace Walpole when, to use his own expression, he laid it on him "so unsparingly." To this his correspondence affords no clue. Mr. Cunningham holds that he did it "to revenge the dislike which Walpole bore to the Bedford faction, the followers of Fox and the Shelburne school." It is possible, as another authority has suggested, that "in the Whig circles of Macaulay's time, there existed a traditional grudge against Horace Walpole," owing to obscure political causes connected with his influence over his friend Conway. But these reasons do not seem relevant enough to make Macaulay's famous onslaught a mere vendetta. It is more reasonable to suppose that between his avowed delight in Walpole as a letter-writer and his robust contempt for him as an individual,

- he found a subject to his hand, which admitted of all the brilliant antithesis and sparkle of epigram which he lavished upon it. Walpole's trivialities and eccentricities, his whims and affectations, are seized with remorseless skill, and presented with all the rhetorical advantages with which the writer so well knew how to invest them. As regards his literary estimate, the truth of the picture can scarcely be gainsaid; but the personal character, as Walpole's surviving friends felt, is certainly too much en noir. Miss Berry, indeed, in her "Advertisement" to Vol. vi of Wright's edition of the Letters, raised a gentle cry of expostulation against the entire representation. She laid stress upon the fact that Macaulay had not known Walpole in the flesh (a disqualification to which too much weight may easily be attached); she dwelt upon the warmth of Walpole's attachments; she contested the charge of affectation, and, in short, made such a gallant attempt at a defence as her loyalty to her old friend enabled her to offer. Yet, if Macaulay had never known Walpole at all, she herself, it might be urged, had only known him in his old age. Upon the whole, "with due allowance for a spice of critical pepper on one hand, and a handful of friendly rosemary on the other," as Croker says, both characters are "substantially true." Under Macaulay's brush Walpole is depicted as he appeared to that critic's masculine and (for the nonce) unsympathetic spirit; in Miss Berry's picture, the likeness is touched with a pencil at once grateful, affectionate, and indulgent. The biographer of to-day who is neither endeavouring to portray Walpole in his most favourable aspect, nor preoccupied (as Cunningham supposed the great Whig essayist to have been) with what would be thought of his work “at Woburn, at Kensington, and in Berkeley Square,” may safely borrow details from the delineation of either artist.

Of portraits of Walpole (not in words) there is no lack. Besides that belonging to Mrs. Bedford, described in Chapter i, there is the enamel by Zincke painted in 1745, which is reproduced at p. 71 of Vol. i of Cunningham’s edition. There is another portrait of him by Nathaniel Hone, R. A., in the National Portrait Gallery. A more characteristic presentment than any of these is the little drawing by Müntz which shews his patron sitting in the Library at Strawberry with the Thames and a passing barge seen through the open window. But his most interesting portraits are two which exhibit him in manhood and old age. One is the half-length by J. G. Eckardt which once hung in its black and gold frame in the Blue Bedchamber of the Gothic castle, near the companion pictures of Gray and Bentley. Like these, it was “from Vandyck,” that is to say it was in a costume copied from that painter, and depicts the sitter in a laced collar and ruffles, leaning upon a copy of the Ædes Walpolianæ, with a view of part of the Gothic castle in the distance. The canvas bears at the back the date of 1754, so that it represents him at the age of seven-and-thirty. The shaven face is rather lean than thin, the forehead high, the brown hair brushed back and slightly curled. The eyes are dark, bright, and intelligent, and the small mouth wears a slight smile. The other, a drawing by Sir Thomas Lawrence, is that of a much older man, having been executed in 1796. The eyelids droop wearily; the thin lips have a pinched, mechanical urbanity, and the features are worn by years and ill-health. It is reproduced as a frontispiece in Vol. i of his works. There are other portraits by Reynolds, 1757 (which Mc-Ardell engraved), by Rosalba, Reading, Parisot, Dance, and Barlow; but it is sufficient to have indicated those mentioned above.

Of the Walpole of later years there are more descriptions than one, and among these, that given by Miss Hawkins, the daughter of the pompous author of the History of Music, is, if the most familiar, also the most graphic. Sir John Hawkins was Walpole's neighbour at Twickenham House, and the History is said to have been undertaken at Walpole's instance. Miss Hawkins's description is of Walpole as she recalled him before 1772. "His figure," she says, . . . "was not merely tall, but more properly long and slender to excess; his complexion and particularly his hands, of a most unhealthy paleness. . . . His eyes were remarkably bright and penetrating, very dark and lively:—his voice was not strong, but his tones were extremely pleasant, and if I may so say, highly gentlemanly. I do not remember his common gait; * he always entered a room in that style of affected delicacy, which fashion had made almost natural; — chapeau bras between his hands as if he wished to compress it, or under his arm — knees bent, and feet on tip-toe, as if afraid of a wet floor. His dress in visiting was most usually, in summer when I most saw him, a lavender suit, the waistcoat embroidered with a little silver or of white silk worked in the tambour, partridge silk stockings, and gold buckles; ruffles and frill generally lace.

* It must, by his own account, have been peculiar. "Walking is not one of my excellences," he writes. "In my best days Mr. Winnington said I tripped like a peewit; and if I do not flatter myself, my march at present is more like a dabchick's" (Walpole to Lady Ossory, 18 August, 1775).

I remember when a child, thinking him very much under-dressed if at any time except in mourning, he wore hemmed cambric. In summer no powder, but his wig combed straight, and showing his very smooth pale forehead, and queued behind:—in winter powder.”*

Pinkerton, who knew Walpole from 1784 until his death, and whose disappointment of a legacy is supposed, in places, to have mingled a more than justifiable amount of gall with his ink, has nevertheless left a number of interesting particulars respecting his habits and personal characteristics. They are too long to quote entire; but are, at the same time, too picturesque to be greatly compressed. He contradicts Miss Hawkins in one respect, for he says Walpole was “short and slender,” but “compact and neatly formed,” an account which is confirmed by Müntz’s full-length. “When viewed from behind, he had somewhat of a boyish appearance, owing to the form of his person, and the simplicity of his dress.” None of his pictures, says Pinkerton, “express the placid goodness of his eyes, which would often sparkle with sudden rays of wit, or dart forth flashes of the most keen and intuitive intelligence. His laugh was forced and uncouth, and even his smile not the most pleasing."

* Anecdotes, etc., by L. M. Hawkins, 1822, pp. 105–6.

"His walk was enfeebled by the gout; which, if the editor's memory do not deceive, he mentioned that he had been tormented with since the age of twenty-five, adding, at the same time, that it was no hereditary complaint, his father, Sir Robert Walpole, who always drank ale, never having known that disorder, and far less his other parent. This painful complaint not only affected his feet, but attacked his hands to such a degree that his fingers were always swelled and deformed, and discharged large chalk-stones once or twice a year; upon which occasion he would observe, with a smile, that he must set up an inn, for he could chalk up a score with more ease and rapidity than any man in England."

After referring to the strict temperance of his life, Pinkerton goes on:—

"Though he sat up very late, either writing or conversing, he generally rose about nine o'clock, and appeared in the breakfast room, his constant and chosen apartment, with fine vistas towards the Thames. His approach was proclaimed, and attended, by a favourite little dog, the legacy of the Marquise du Deffand,* and which ease and attention had rendered so fat that it could hardly move. This was placed beside him on a small sofa; the tea-kettle, stand and heater, were brought in, and he drank two or three cups of that liquor out of most rare and precious ancient porcelain of Japan, of a fine white, embossed with large leaves. The account of his china cabinet, in his description of his villa, will show how rich he was in that elegant luxury. . . . The loaf and butter were not spared . . . and the dog and the squirrels had a liberal share of his repast.*

* Tonton. See note to Chapter ix.

“Dinner [his hour for which was four] was served up in the small parlour, or large dining room, as it happened: in winter generally the former. His valet a [Swiss named Colomb] supported him downstairs,† and he ate most moderately of chicken, pheasant, or any light food. Pastry he disliked, as difficult of digestion, though he would taste a morsel of venison pye. Never, but once that he drank two glasses of white wine, did the editor see him taste any liquor, except ice-water. A pail of ice was placed under the table, in which stood a decanter of water, from which he supplied himself with his favourite beverage. . . .

“If his guest liked even a moderate quantity of wine, he must have called for it during dinner, for almost instantly after he rang the bell to order coffee up-stairs. Thither he would pass about five o’clock, and generally resuming his place on the sofa, would sit till two o’clock in the morning in miscellaneous chit-chat, full of singular anecdotes, strokes of wit, and acute observations, occasionally sending for books, or curiosities, or passing to the library, as any reference happened to arise in conversation. After his coffee he tasted nothing; but the snuff box of tabac d’etrennes from Fribourg’s was not forgotten, and was replenished from a canister lodged in an ancient marble urn of great thickness, which stood in the window seat, and served to secure its moisture and rich flavour.

* Another passage in the Walpoliana (1, 71-2) explains this:— “Regularly after breakfast, in the summer season, at least, Mr. Walpole used to mix bread and milk in a large basin, and throw it out at the window of the sitting-room, for the squirrels, who, soon after, came down from the high trees, to enjoy their allowance.”

† “I cannot go up and down stairs without being led by a servant. It is tempus abire for me: lusi satis” (Walpole to Pinckerton, 15 May, 1794).

“Such was a private rainy day of Horace Walpole. The forenoon quickly passed in roaming through the numerous apartments of the house, in which, after twenty visits still something new would occur, and he was indeed constantly adding fresh acquisitions. Sometimes a walk in the grounds would intervene, on which occasions he would go out in his slippers through a thick dew; and he never wore a hat. He said that, on his first visit to Paris, he was ashamed of his effeminacy, when he saw every little meagre Frenchman, whom even he could have thrown down with a breath, walking without a hat, which he could not do, without a certainty of that disease, which the Germans say is endemic in England, and is termed by the natives le catch-cold.^{*} The first trial cost him a slight fever, but he got over it, and never caught cold afterwards, draughts of air, damp rooms, windows open at his back, all situations were alike to him in this respect. He would even show some little offence at any solicitude, expressed by his guests on such an occasion, as an idea arising from the seeming tenderness of his frame; and would say, with a half smile of good-humoured crossness, ‘My back is the same with my face, and my neck is like my nose.’ His ice water he not only regarded as a preservative from such an accident, but he would sometimes observe that he thought his stomach and bowels would last longer than his bones; such conscious vigour and strength in those parts did he feel from the use of that beverage.”[†]

The only particular that Cunningham adds to this chronicle of his habits is one too characteristic of the man to be omitted. After dinner at Strawberry, he says, the scent was

* “I have persisted”—he tells Gray from Paris in January, 1766

—“through this Siberian winter in not adding a grain to my clothes and in going open-breasted without an under waistcoat.”

† Walpoliana, xl—xlv.

removed by “a censer or pot of frankincense.” According to the Description, etc., there was a tripod of ormoulu kept in the Breakfast Room for this purpose. It is difficult to identify the “ancient marble urn of great thickness” in which the snuff was stored; but it may have been that “of granite, brought from one of the Greek Islands, and given to Sir Robert Walpole by Sir Charles Wager” which stood in the same room.

Walpole’s character may be considered in a fourfold aspect, as a man, a virtuoso, a politician, and an author. The first is the least easy to describe. What strikes one most forcibly is, that he was primarily and before all an aristocrat, or, as in his own day he would have been called, a “person of quality,” whose warmest sympathies were reserved for those of his own rank. Out of the charmed circle of the peerage and baronetage, he had few strong connections; and although in middle life he corresponded voluminously with antiquaries such as Cole and Zouch, and in the languor of his old age turned eagerly to the renovating society of young women such as Hannah More and the Miss Berrys, however high his heart may have placed them, it may be doubted whether his head ever quite exalted them to the level of Lady Caroline Petersham, or Lady Ossory, or Her Grace of Gloucester. In a measure, this would also account for his unsympathetic attitude to some of the great literati of his day. With Gray he had been at school and college, which made a difference; but he no doubt regarded Fielding and Hogarth and Goldsmith and Johnson, apart from their confessed hostility to “high life” and his beloved “genteel comedy,” as gifted but undesirable outsiders—“horn-handed breakers of the glebe” in Art and Letters—with whom it would be impossible to be as intimately familiar as one could be with such glorified amateurs as Bunbury and Lady Lucan and Lady Di. Beauclerk, who were all more or less born in the purple. To the friends of his own class he was constant and considerate, and he seems to have cherished a genuine affection to Conway, George Montagu, and Sir Horace Mann. With regard to Gray, his relations, it would seem, were rather those of intellectual affinity and esteem than downright affection. But his closest friends were women. In them, that is in the women of his time, he found just that atmosphere of sunshine and insouciance, those conversational “lilacs and nightingales,” in which his soul delighted, and which were most congenial to his restless intelligence and easily fatigued temperament. To have seen him at his best one should have listened to him, not when he was playing the antiquary with Ducale or Conyers Middleton, but gossiping of ancient greenroom scandals at Cliveden, or explaining the mysteries of the “Officina Arbuteana” to Madame de Boufflers or Lady Townshend, or delighting Mary and Agnes Berry, in the half-light of the Round Drawing Room at Strawberry, with his old stories of Lady Suffolk and Lady Hervey, and of the monstrous raven, under guise of which the disembodied spirit of His Majesty King George the First was supposed to have revisited the disconsolate Duchess of Kendal. Comprehending thoroughly that cardinal precept of conversation—“never to weary your hearer,” he was an admirable raconteur; and his excellent memory, shrewd perceptions, and volatile wit—all the more piquant for its never-failing spark of well-bred malice—must have made him a most captivating companion. If—as Scott says—his temper was “precarious,” it is more charitable to remember that in middle and later life he was nearly always tormented with a malady seldom favourable to good humour, than to explain the less amiable details of his conduct (as does Mr. Croker) by the hereditary taint of insanity. In a life of eighty years many hot friendships cool, even with tempers not “precarious.” As regards the charges sometimes made against him of coldness and want of generosity, very good evidence would be required before they could be held to be established; and a man is not necessarily niggardly because his benefactions do not come up to the standard of all the predatory members of the community. It is besides clear, as Conway and Madame du Deffand would have testified, that he could be royally generous when necessity required. That he was careful rather than lavish in his expenditure must be admitted. It may be added that he was very much in bondage to public opinion, and morbidly sensitive to ridicule.

As a virtuoso and amateur, his position is a mixed one. He was certainly widely different from that typical art connoisseur of his day—the butt of Goldsmith and of Reynolds—who travelled the Grand Tour to litter a gallery at home with broken-nosed busts and the rubbish of the Roman picture-factories. As the preface to the Ædes Walpolianæ shewed, he really knew something about painting, in fact was a capable draughtsman himself, and besides, through Mann and others, had enjoyed exceptional opportunities for procuring genuine antiques. But his collection was not so rich in this way as might have been anticipated; and his portraits, his china, and his miniatures were probably his best possessions. For the rest, he was an indiscriminate rather than an eclectic collector; and there was also considerable truth in that strange “attraction from the great to the little, and from the useful to the odd” which Macaulay has noted. Many of the marvels at Strawberry would never have found a place in the treasure-houses—say of Beckford or Samuel Rogers. It is difficult to fancy Birmingham’s fables in paper on looking-glass, or Hubert’s cardcuttings, or the fragile mosaics of Mrs. Delany either at Fonthill or St. James’s Place. At the same time, it should be remembered that several of the most trivial or least defensible objects were presents which possibly reflected rather the charity of the recipient than the good taste of the giver. All the articles over which Macaulay lingers, Wolsey's hat, Van Tromp's pipe case, and King William's spurs, were obtained in this way ; and (with a laugher) Horace Walpole, who laughed a good deal himself, would probably have made as merry as the most mirth-loving spectator could have desired. But such items gave a heterogeneous character to the gathering, and turned what might have been a model museum into an old curiosity-shop. In any case, however, it was a memorable curiosity-shop, and in this modern era of bric-à-brac would probably attract far more serious attention than it did in those practical and pre-aesthetic days of 1842 when it fell under the hammer of George Robins.*

Walpole's record as a politician is a brief one, and if his influence upon the questions of his time was of any importance, it must have been exercised unobtrusively. During the period of the “great Walpolean battle,” as Junius styled the struggle that culminated in the downfall of Lord Orford, he was a fairly regular attendant

* See Mr. Robins's Catalogue of the Classic Contents of Strawberry Hill, etc. [1842.] 4to.

in the House of Commons; and, as we have seen, spoke in his father's behalf when the motion was made for an enquiry into his conduct. Nine years later, he moved the address, and a few years later still, delivered a speech upon the employment of Swiss Regiments in the Colonies. Finally he resigned his "senatorial dignity," quitting the scene with the valediction of those who deprecate what they no longer desire to retain. "What could I see but sons and grandsons playing over the same knaveries, that I have seen their fathers and grandfathers act. Could I ever hear oratory beyond my Lord Chatham's? Will there ever be parts equal to Charles Townshend's? Will George Grenville cease to be the most tiresome of beings?"* In his earlier days he was a violent Whig—"at times almost a Republican" (to which latter phase of his opinions must be attributed the transformation of King Charles's death-warrant into "Major Charta"); "in his old and enfeebled age," says Miss Berry, "the horrors of the first French Revolution made him a Tory; while he always lamented, as one of the worst effects of its excesses, that they must necessarily retard to a distant period the progress and establishment of religious liberty." He deplored the American War, and disapproved the Slave Trade; but, in sum, it is to be suspected that his main interest in politics, after his father's death, and apart from the preservation throughout an "age of small factions" of his own uncertain sinecures, was the good and ill-fortune of the handsome and amiable, but moderately eminent statesman General Conway. It was for Conway that he took his most active steps in the direction of political intrigue; and perhaps his most important political utterance is the Counter Address to the Public on the late Dismissal of a General Officer, which was prompted by Conway's deprivation of his command for voting in the opposition with himself in the debate upon the illegality of general warrants. Whether he would have taken office if it had been offered to him, may be a question; but his attitude, as disclosed by his letters, is a rather hesitating nolo episcopari. The most interesting result of his connection with public affairs is the series of sketches of political men dispersed through his correspondence, and through the posthumous Memoirs published by Lord Holland and Sir

* Walpole to Montagu, 12 March, 1768.

Denis Le Marchant. Making every allowance for his prejudices and partisanship (and of neither can Walpole be acquitted), it is impossible not to regard these latter as remarkable contributions to historical literature. Even Mr. Croker admits that they contain "a considerable portion of voluntary or involuntary truth," and such an admission, when extorted from Lord Beaconsfield's "Rigby," of whom no one can justly say that he was ignorant of the politics of Walpole's day, has all the force of an unsolicited testimonial.*

* The full titles of these memoirs are Memoires of the last Ten Years of the Reign of King George II. Edited by Lord Holland. 2 vols., 4to, 1822; and Memoirs of the Reign of King George III. Edited, with Notes, by Sir Denis Le Marchant, Bart. 4 vols., 8vo, 1845. Both were reviewed, more suo, by Mr. Croker in the Quarterly, with the main intention of proving that all Walpole's pictures of his contemporaries were coloured and distorted by successive disappointments arising out of his anxieties respecting the patent places from which he derived his income,—in other words (Mr. Croker's words!) that "the whole is 'a copious polyglot of spleen.'" Such an investigation was in the favourite line of the critic, and might be expected to result in a formidable indictment. But the best judges hold it to have been exaggerated and to-day the method of Mr. Croker is more or less discredited. Indeed, it is an instance of those quaint revenges of the whirligig of time, that some of his utterances are more applicable to himself than Walpole. "His (Walpole's) natural inclination (says Croker) was to grope an obscure way through mazes and souterrains rather than walk the high road by daylight. He is never satisfied with the plain and obvious cause of any effect, and is for ever striving after some tortuous solution." This is precisely what unkind modern critics affirm of the Rt. Honourable John Wilson Croker.

This mention of the Memoirs naturally leads us to that final consideration, the position of Walpole as an author. Most of the productions which fill the five large volumes given to the world in 1798 by Miss Berry's pious care have been referred to in the course of the foregoing pages, and it is not necessary to recapitulate them here. The place which they occupy in English literature was never a large one, and it has grown smaller with lapse of time. Walpole, in truth, never took letters with sufficient seriousness. He was willing enough to obtain repute, but upon condition that he should be allowed to despise his calling and laugh at "thoroughness." If masterpieces could have been dashed off at a hand-gallop; if antiquarian studies could have been made of permanent value by the exercise of mere elegant facility; if a dramatic reputation could have been secured by the simple accumulation of horrors upon Horror's head, his might have been a great literary name. But it is not thus the severer Muses are cultivated; and Walpole's mood was too variable, his industry too intermittent, his fine-gentleman self-consciousness too inveterate to admit of his producing anything that (as one of his critics has said) deserves a higher title than "opuscula."

His essays in the World lead one to think that he might have made a more than respectable essayist, if he had not fallen upon days in which that form of writing was practically outworn; and it is manifest that he would have been an admirable writer of familiar verse if he could have forgotten the fallacy (exposed by Johnson) that easy verse is to be written easily. Nevertheless, in the Gothic romance which was suggested by his Gothic castle—for, to speak paradoxically, Strawberry Hill is almost as much as Walpole the author of the Castle of Otranto—he managed to initiate a new form of fiction; and by decorating “with gay strings the gatherings of Virtue,” he preserved serviceably, in the Anecdotes of Painting, a mass of curious, if sometimes uncritical, information which, in other circumstances, must have been hopelessly lost. If anything else of his professed literary work is worthy of recollection, it must be a happy squib such as the Letter of Xo Ho, a fable such as The Entail, or an essay such as that On Gardening, a subject of all others upon which he could speak with authority.*

* Essai sur l'Art des Jardins Modernes. Par M. Horace Walpole, traduit en François par M. le Duc de Nivernois en 1784.

Imprimé à Strawberry Hill, par T. Kirgate; 1785, 4to. Every page of French has an opposite one in English.

But it is not by his professedly literary work that he has acquired the reputation which he retains and must continue to retain. It is as a letter-writer that he survives; and it is upon the vast correspondence, of which, even now, we seem scarcely to have reached the limits, that is based his surest claim volitare per ora virum. The qualities which are his defects in more serious productions become merits in his correspondence; or, rather, they cease to be defects. No one looks for prolonged effort in a gossiping epistle; a weighty reasoning is less important than a light hand; and variety pleases more surely than symmetry of structure. Among the little band of those who have distinguished themselves in this way, Walpole is in the foremost rank; nay, if wit and brilliancy, without gravity or pathos, are to rank highest, he is first. It matters nothing whether he wrote easily or with difficulty; whether he did, or did not, make minutes of apt illustrations or descriptive incidents; the result is delightful. For diversity of interest and perpetual entertainment, for the constant surprises of an unique species of wit, for happy and unexpected turns of phrase, for graphic characterisation and clever anecdote, for playfulness, pungency, irony, persiflage, there is nothing like his letters in English. And when one remembers that, in addition to all this, they constitute a sixty-years' social chronicle of a specially picturesque era by one of the most picturesque of picturesque chroniclers, there can be no need to bespeak any further suffrage for Horace Walpole's incomparable correspondence.

APPENDIX.

APPENDIX.

BOOKS PRINTED AT THE STRAWBERRY HILL PRESS.

* * * The following list contains all the books mentioned in the Description of the Villa of Mr. Horace Walpole, etc., 1784, together with those issued between that date and Walpole's death. It does not include the several title-pages and labels which he printed from time to time, or the quatrains and verses purporting to be addressed by the Press to Lady Rochford, Lady Townshend, Madame de Boufflers, the Miss Berrys, and others. Nor does it comprise the pieces struck off by Mr. Kirgate, the printer, for the benefit of himself and his friends. On the other hand, all the works enumerated here are, with three exceptions, described from copies in the possession of the present writer or to be found in the British Museum and the Dyce and Forster Library at South Kensington.

1757.

Odes by Mr. Gray. Φωνάντα συνετοίς! — Pindar, Olymp. II. [Strawberry Hill Bookplate.] Printed at Strawberry-Hill, for R. and J. Dodsley in Pall-Mall, MDCCCLVII.

Pp. 22 (last blank). Half-title,— “Odes by Mr. Gray. [Price one Shilling.]” 4to. 1000 copies printed. “June 25th, [1757] I erected a printing-press at my house at Strawberry Hill.” “Aug. 8th, I published two Odes by Mr. Gray, the first production of my press” (Short Notes). “And with what do you think we open? Cedite, Romani Impressores—with nothing under Graii Carmina. I found him [Gray] in town last week: he had brought his two Odes to be printed. I snatched them out of Dodsley’s hands.” . . . (Walpole to Chute, 12 July, 1757). “I send you two copies (one for Dr. Cocchi) of a very honourable opening of my press—two amazing Odes of Mr. Gray; they are Greek, they are Pindaric, they are sublime! consequently I fear a little obscure” (Walpole to Mann, 4 Aug., 1757). “You are very particular, I can tell you, in liking Gray’s Odes—but you must remember that the age likes Akenside, and did like Thomson! can the same people like both?” (Walpole to Montagu, 25 Aug., 1757).

To Mr. Gray, on his Odes. [By David Garrick.]

Single leaf containing six quatrains (24 lines). 4to. Only six copies are said to have been printed. Of these, one is in the Dyce Collection at South Kensington.

A Journey into England. By Paul Hentzner, in the year M.D.XC.VIII. [Strawberry Hill Bookplate.] Printed at Strawberry-Hill, MDCCCLVII.

Title, Dedication (2 leaves); pp. x—103; Latin and English on opposite pages, 207 in all (last blank). Sm. 8vo. 220 copies printed. “In Oct., 1757, was finished at my press an edition of Hentznerus, translated by Mr. Bentley, to which I wrote an advertisement. I dedicated it to the Society of Antiquaries, of which I am a member” (Short Notes). “An edition of Hentznerus, with a version by Mr. Bentley, and a little preface of mine, were prepared [i. e., as the first issue of the press], but are to wait [for Gray's Odes]” (Walpole to Chute, 12 July, 1757).

1758.

A Catalogue of the Royal and Noble Authors of England, with Lists of their Works. Dove, diavolo! Messer Ludovico, avete pigliato tante coglionerie? Card. d'Este, to Ariosto. Vol. i. [Strawberry Hill Bookplate.] Printed at Strawberry-Hill. MDCCLVIII.

— Vol. ii. [Strawberry Hill Bookplate.] Printed at Strawberry-Hill. MDCCLVIII.

Vol. i,—Title; Dedication of 2 leaves to Lord Hertford; Advertisement of viii pages; pp. 220 (last blank); and unpaged Index. 8vo. 300 copies issued. A second edition, “corrected and enlarged,” was printed in 1758 (but dated 1759) in two vols, 8vo, “for R. and J. Dodsley in Pallmall; and J. Graham in the Strand.” According to Baker (Catalogue of Books, etc., printed at the Press at Strawberry Hill [1810]), 40 copies of a supplement or Postscript to the Royal and Noble Authors were printed by Kirgate in 1786. “In April, 1758, was finished the first impression of my ‘Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors,’ which I had written the preceding year in less than five months” (Short Notes). “My book is marvellously in fashion, to my great astonishment. I did not expect so much truth and such notions of liberty would have made their fortune in this our day” (Walpole to Montagu, 4 May, 1758). “Dec. 5th [1758] was published the second edition of my ‘Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors.’ Two thousand were printed, but not at Strawberry Hill” (Short Notes).

An Account of Russia as it was in the Year 1710. By Charles Lord Whitworth. [Strawberry Hill Bookplate.] Printed at Strawberry-Hill. MDCCLVIII.

Pp. xxiv—160 (last blank). Sm. 8vo. 700 copies printed. “The beginning of October, [1758] I published Lord Whitworth’s account of Russia, to which I wrote the advertisement” (Short Notes). “A book has been left at your ladyship's house; it is Lord Whitworth's Account of Russia" (Walpole to Lady Hervey, 17 Oct., 1758). Mr. (afterwards Lord) Whitworth was Ambassador to St. Petersburg in the reign of Peter the Great.

The Mistakes; or, the Happy Resentment. A Comedy.
By the late Lord * * * * [Henry Hyde, Lord Hyde and Cornbury]. London: Printed by S. Richardson, in the year 1758.

Title; List of Subscribers, pp. xvi; Advertisement, Prologue, and Dramatis Personæ, 2 leaves; pp. 86 (last blank). Baker gives the following particulars from the Biographia Dramatica as to this book:—"The Author of this Piece was the learned, ingenious, and witty LORD CORNBURY, but it was never acted. He made a present of it to that great Actress, Mrs. PORTER, to make what Emolument she could by it. And that Lady after his Death, published it by Subscription, at Five Shillings, each Book, which was so much patronised by the Nobility and Gentry that Three Thousand Copies were disposed of. Prefixed to it was a Preface, by Mr. HORACE WALPOLE, at whose Press at Strawberry-Hill it was printed." Baker adds, "Mr. Yardley, who, when living, kept a Bookseller's Shop in New-Inn Passage, confirmed this account, by asserting that he assisted in printing it at that Press." But Baker nevertheless prefixes an asterisk to the title which implies that it was "not printed for Mr. Walpole," and this probably accounts for Richardson's name on the title-page. By the subscription list, the Hon. Horace Walpole took 21 copies, David Garrick, 38, and Mr. Samuel Richardson of Salisbury Court, 4. All Walpole says is, "About the same time [1758] Mrs. Porter published [for her benefit] Lord Hyde's play, to which I had written the advertisement" (Short Notes).

A Parallel; in the Manner of Plutarch: between a most celebrated Man of Florence; and one, scarce ever heard of, in England. By the Reverend Mr. Spence. "—Parvis componere magna"—Virgil. [Portrait in circle of Maglia-becchi.] Printed at Strawberry-Hill by William Robinson;

*and sold by Messieurs Dodsley, at Tully's Head, Pall Mall ;
for the Benefit of Mr. Hill. MDCCLVIII.*

Pp. 104. Sm. 8vo. 700 copies printed. "1759. Feb. 2nd, I published Mr. Spence's Parallel of Magliabechi and Mr. Hill, a tailor of Buckingham; calculated to raise a little sum of money for the latter poor man. Six hundred copies were sold in a fortnight, and it was reprinted in London" (Short Notes). "Mr. Spence's Magliabechi is published to-day from Strawberry; I believe you saw it, and shall have it: but 'tis not worth sending you on purpose" (Walpole to Chute, 2 Feb., 1759).

Fugitive Pieces in Verse and Prose. Pereunt et imputantur.
[Strawberry Hill Bookplate.] Printed at Strawberry-Hill,
MDCCLVIII.

Pp. vi—220 (last blank), sm. 8vo. 200 copies printed. "In the summer of 1758, I printed some of my own Fugitive Pieces, and dedicated them to my cousin, General Conway" (Short Notes). "March 17, [1759,] I began to distribute some copies of my 'Fugitive Pieces,' collected and printed together at Strawberry Hill, and dedicated to General Conway" (ibid.). One of these, which is in the Forster Collection at South Kensington, went to Gray. "This Book (says a MS. inscription) once belonged to Gray the Poet, and has his autograph on the Title-page. I [i. e., George Daniel, of Canonbury] bought it at Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson's Sale Rooms for £1.19 on Thursday, 28 Augt. 1851, from the valuable collection of Mr. Penn of Stoke."

1760.

Catalogue of the Pictures and Drawings in the Holbein Chamber at Strawberry Hill. Strawberry-Hill, 1760.

Pp. 8. 8vo. [Lowndes.]

Catalogue of the Collections of Pictures of the Duke of Devonshire, General Guise, and the late Sir Paul Methuen.
Strawberry-Hill, 1760.

Pp. 44. 8vo. 12 copies, printed on one side only. [Lowndes.]

M. Annæi Lucani Pharsalia cum Notis Hugoni Grotii, et Richardi Bentleii. Multa sunt condonanda in opere pos- tumo. In Librum iv, Nota 641. [Emblematical vignette.]
Strawberry-Hill, MDCCCLX.

Title, Dedication (by Richard Cumberland to Halifax), and Advertisement (Ad Lectorem), 3 leaves; pp. 526 (last blank). 4to. 500 copies printed. Cumberland took up the editing when Bentley the younger resigned it. "I am just undertaking an edition of Lucan, my friend Mr. Bentley having in his possession his father's notes and emendations on the first seven books" (Walpole to Zouch, 9 Dec., 1758). "I would not alone undertake to correct the press; but I am so lucky as to live in the strictest friendship with Dr. Bentley's only son, who, to all the ornament of learning, has the amiable turn of mind, disposition, and easy wit" (Walpole to Zouch, 12 Jan., 1759).

Lucan is in poor forwardness. I have been plagued with a succession of bad printers, and am not got beyond the fourth book. It will scarce appear before next winter" (Walpole to Zouch, 23 Dec., 1759). "My Lucan is finished, but will not be published till after Christmas" (Walpole to Zouch, 27 Nov., 1760). "I have delivered to your brother . . . a Lucan, printed at Strawberry, which, I trust, you will think a handsome edition" (Walpole to Mann, 27 Jan., 1761).

1762.

Anecdotes of Painting in England; with some Account of the principal Artists; and incidental Notes on other Arts; collected by the late Mr. George Vertue; and now digested and published from his original MSS. By Mr. Horace Walpole. Multa renascentur quæ cedere. Vol. I. [Device with Walpole's crest.] Printed by Thomas Farmer, at Strawberry-Hill, MDCCCLXII.

— Le sachant Anglois, je crus qu'il m'alloit parler d'édi- fices et de peintures. Nouvelle Eloise, vol. i, p. 245. Vol.
II. [Device with Walpole's crest.] Printed by Thomas Farmer, at Strawberry-Hill, MDCCCLXII.

— Vol. III. Motto of six lines from Prior's Protagenes and Apelles. Strawberry-Hill: Printed in the year MDCCLXIII.

— To which is added the History of the Modern Taste in Gardening. The Glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the Fir-Tree, the Pine-Tree, and the Box together, to beautify the place of my Sanctuary, and I will make the Place of my Feet glorious. Isaiah, lx. 13. Volume the Fourth and last. Strawberry-Hill: Printed by Thomas Kirgate, MDCCLXXI.

Vol. i,— pp. xiv — 168, with Appendix and Index unpageD.
Vol. ii,— Title; pp. 158, with Appendix and Index unpageD; and “Additional Lives to First Edition of Anecdotes of Painting in England,” pp. 12. Vol. iii,— Title; pp. 155, with Appendix and Index unpageD; and “Additional Lives to the First Edition of Anecdotes of Painting in England,” pp. 4. Vol. iv,— pp. x — 52; Appendix of one leaf (“Prints by or after Hogarth, discovered since the Catalogue was finished”), and Index unpageD. The volumes are 4to, with many portraits and plates. 600 copies were printed. The fourth volume was in type in 1770, but not issued until Oct., 1780. It was dedicated to the Duke of Richmond—Lady Hervey, to whom the three earlier volumes had been inscribed, having died in 1768. A second edition of the first three volumes was printed by Thomas Kirgate at Strawberry Hill in 1765. “Sept. 1st [1759]. I began to look over Mr. Vertue’s MSS., which I bought last year for one hundred pounds, in order to compose the Lives of English Painters” (Short Notes). “1760, Jan. 1st. I began the Lives of English Artists, from Vertue’s MSS. (that is, ‘Anecdotes of Painting,’ &c.)” (ibid). “Aug. 14th. Finished the first volume of my ‘Anecdotes of Painting in England.’ Sept. 5th, began the second volume. Oct. 23d, finished the second volume” (ibid). “1761. Jan. 4th, began the third volume” (ibid). “June 29th, resumed the third volume of my ‘Anecdotes of Painting,’ which I had laid aside after the first day” (ibid). “Aug. 22nd, finished the third volume of my ‘Anecdotes of Painting’” (ibid). “The ‘Anecdotes of Painting’ have succeeded to the press: I have finished two volumes; but as there will at least be a third, I am not determined whether I shall not wait to publish the whole together. You will be surprised, I think, to see what a quantity of materials the industry of one man (Vertue) could amass!" (Walpole to Zouch, 27 Nov., 1760). "You drive your expectations much too fast, in thinking my 'Anecdotes of Painting' are ready to appear, in demanding three volumes. You will see but two, and it will be February first" (Walpole to Montagu, 30 Dec., 1761). "I am now publishing the third volume, and another of Engravers" (Walpole to Dalrymple, 31 Jan., 1764). "I have advertised my long-delayed last volume of 'Painters' to come out, and must be in town to distribute it" (Walpole to Lady Ossory, 23 Sept., 1780). "I have left with Lord Harcourt for you my new old last volume of 'Painters'" (Walpole to Mason, 13 Oct., 1780).

1763.

A Catalogue of Engravers, who have been born, or resided in England; digested by Mr. Horace Walpole from the MSS. of Mr. George Vertue; to which is added an Account of the Life and Works of the latter. And Art reflected images to Art. . . . Pope. Strawberry-Hill: Printed in the Year MDCCCLXIII.

Title; pp. 128, last page dated "Oct. 10th, 1762"; "Life of Mr. George Vertue," pp. 14; "List of Vertue's Works," pp. 20, last page dated "Oct. 22d, 1762"; Index of Names of Engravers, unpage. 4to. "Aug. 2nd [1762,] began the 'Catalogue of Engravers.' October 10th, finished it" (Short Notes). "The volume of Engravers is printed off, and has been some time; I only wait for some of the plates" (Walpole to Cole, 8 Oct., 1763). "I am now publishing the third volume [of the 'Anecdotes of Painting'], and another of Engravers" (Walpole to Dalrymple, 31 Jan., 1764).

1764.

Poems by Anna Chamber, Countess Temple. [Plate of Strawberry Hill.] Strawberry-Hill: Printed in the Year MDCCCLXIV.

Pp. 34. 4to. 100 copies printed by Prat. "I shall send you, too, Lady Temple's Poems" (Walpole to Montagu, 16 July, 1764).

The Magpie and her Brood, a Fable, from the Tales of Bonaventure des Periers, Valet de Chambre to the Queen of Navarre; addressed to Miss Hotham.

4 pp., containing 72 lines,—initialled “H. W.” 4to. “Oct. 15th, [1764] wrote the fable of ‘The Magpie and her Brood’ for Miss Hotham, then near eleven years old, great niece of Henrietta Hobart, Countess Dowager of Suffolk. It was taken from Les Nouvelles Récréations de Bonaventure des Periers, Valet-de-Chambre to the Queen of Navarre” (Short Notes).

The Life of Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury, written by Himself. [Plate of Strawberry Hill.] Strawberry-Hill: Printed by Prat in the Year MDCCLXIV.

Title, Dedication, and Advertisement, 5 leaves; pp. 172 (last blank). Folding plate portrait. 4to. 200 copies printed. “1763. Beginning of September wrote the Dedication and Preface to Lord Herbert’s Life” (Short Notes). “It will not be long before I have the pleasure of sending you by far the most curious and entertaining book that my press has produced. . . . It is the life of the famous Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and written by himself—of the contents I will not anticipate one word” (Letter to Mason, 29 Dec., 1763). “The thing most in fashion is my edition of Lord Herbert’s Life; people are mad after it, I believe because only two hundred were printed” (Letter to Montagu, 16 Dec., 1764). “This singular work was printed from the original MS. in 1764, at Strawberry-hill, and is perhaps the most extraordinary account that ever was given seriously by a wise man of himself” (Walpole, Works, 1798, i. 363).

1768

Cornélie, Vestale. Tragédie. [By the President Hénault.] Imprimée à Strawberry-Hill, MDCCCLXVIII.

Pp. vi — 92 (last blank). 8vo. 200 copies printed; 150 went to Paris. Kirgate printed it. “My press is revived, and is printing a French play written by the old President Hénault. It was damned many years ago at Paris, and yet I think is better than some that have succeeded, and much better than any of our modern tragedies. I print it to please the old man, as he was exceedingly kind to me at Paris; but I doubt whether he will live till it is finished. He is to have a hundred copies, and there are to be but an hundred more, of which you shall have one" (Letter to Montagu, 15 April, 1768). President Hénault died November, 1770, aged eighty-six.

The Mysterious Mother. A Tragedy. By Mr. Horace Walpole. Sit mihi fas audita loqui! Virgil. Printed at Strawberry-Hill: MDCCCLXVIII.

Title, Erratum, "Persons" (2 leaves); pp. 120, with Postscript, pp. 10. Sm. 8vo. 50 copies printed. "March 15, [1768] I finished a tragedy called 'The Mysterious Mother,' which I had begun Dec. 25, 1766" (Short Notes). "I thank you for myself, not for my Play. . . . I accept with great thankfulness what you have voluntarily been so good as to do for me; and should 'the Mysterious Mother' ever be performed when I am dead, it will owe to you its presentation" (Walpole to Mason, 11 May, 1769).

1769

Poems by the Reverend Mr. Hoyland. Printed at Strawberry-Hill: MDCCCLXIX.

Title, Advertisement (2 leaves); pp. 20 (last blank). 8vo. 300 copies printed. "I enclose a short Advertisement for Mr. Hoyland's poems. I mean by it to tempt people to a little more charity, and to soften to him, as much as I can, the humiliation of its being asked for him; if you approve it, it shall be prefixed to the edition" (Walpole to Mason, 5 April, 1769).

1770

Reply to the Observations of the Rev. Dr. Milles, Dean of Exeter, and President of the Society of Antiquaries, on the Ward Robe Account.

Pp. 24. Six copies printed, dated 28 August, 1770 [Baker]. "In the summer of this year [1770] wrote an answer to Dr. Milles' remarks on my 'Richard the Third'" (Short Notes).

1772

Copies of Seven Original Letters from King Edward VI to Barnaby Fitzpatrick. Strawberry-Hill. Printed in the Year M.DCC.LXXII.

Pp. viii — 14. 4to. 200 copies printed. "1771. End of September, wrote the Advertisement to the 'Letters of King Edward the Sixth'" (Short Notes). "I have printed 'King Edward's Letters,' and will bring you a copy" (Walpole to Mason, 6 July, 1772).

Miscellaneous Antiquities; or, a Collection of Curious Papers: either republished from Scarce Tracts or now first printed from original MSS. Number I. To be continued occasionally. Invenies illic et festa domestica vobis. Sæpe tibi Pater est, sæpe legendus Avus. Ovid. Fast. lib. 1. Strawberry-Hill: Printed by Thomas Kirgate, M.DCC. LXXII.

Pp. iv — 48. 4to. 500 copies printed. "I have since begun a kind of Desiderata Curiosa, and intend to publish it in numbers, as I get materials; it is to be an Hospital of Foundlings; and though I shall not take in all that offer, there will be no enquiry into the nobility of the parents; nor shall I care how heterogeneous the brats are" (Walpole to Mason, 6 July, 1772). "By that time too I shall have the first number of my 'Miscellaneous Antiquities' ready. The first essay is only a republication of some tilts and tournaments" (Walpole to Mason, 21 July, 1772).

Miscellaneous Antiquities; or, a Collection of Curious Papers: either republished from Scarce Tracts, or now first printed from original MSS. Number II. To be continued occasionally. Invenies illic et festa domestica vobis. Sæpe tibi Pater est, sæpe legendus Avus. Ovid. Fast. lib. 1.

Strawberry-Hill: Printed by Thomas Kirgate, M.DCC. LXXII.

Pp. 62. 4to. 500 copies printed. "In July [1772] wrote the 'Life of Sir Thomas Wyat [the Elder], No. II. of my edition of 'Miscellaneous Antiquities'" (Short Notes).

Mémoires du Comte de Grammont, par Monsieur le Comte Antoine Hamilton. Nouvelle Edition, augmentée de Notes & d'Eclairecissement nécessaire par M. Horace Walpole. Des gens qui écrivent pour le Comte de Grammont, peuvent compter sur quelque indulgence. V. l'Epitre prelim. p. xviii. Imprimée à Strawberry-Hill, M.DCC. LXXII.

Pp. xxiv — 294 (last blank). Portraits of Hamilton, Mdlle. d'Hamilton, and Philibert Comte de Grammont. 4to. 100 copies printed; 30 went to Paris. It was dedicated to Madame du Deffand, as follows: — "L'Editeur vous consacre cette édition, comme un monument de son amitié, de son admiration, et de son respect, à vous dont les grâces, l'esprit, et le goût retracent au siècle présent le siècle de Louis XIV., et les agréments de l'auteur de ces Mémoires." "I want to send you these [the Miscellaneous Antiquities] . . . and a 'Grammont,' of which I have printed only a hundred copies, and which will be extremely scarce, as twenty-five copies are gone to France" (Walpole to Cole, 8 Jan., 1773).

1774.

A Description of the Villa of Horace Walpole. [Plate of Strawberry Hill.] A Description of the Villa of Horace Walpole, youngest son of Sir Robert Walpole Earl of Orford, at Strawberry-Hill, near Twickenham. With an Inventory of the Furniture, Pictures, Curiosities, &c. Strawberry-Hill: Printed by Thomas Kirgate, M.DCC. LXXIV.

Two titles; pp. 120 (last blank). 4to. 100 copies printed, 6 on large paper. Many copies have the following,— "Appendix. Pictures and Curiosities added since the Catalogue was printed," pp. 121-148 (last blank); "Additions since the Appendix," pp. 149-152; "More Additions," pp. 153-158. Baker speaks of an earlier issue of 65 pp. which we have not met with. Lowndes (Appendix to Bibliographer's Manual, 1864, p. 239) states that it was said by Kirgate to have been used by the servants in showing the house, and differed entirely from the editions of 1774 and 1784.

1775.

To Mrs. Crewe. [Verses by Charles James Fox.] N. D.

Pp. 2. Single leaf. 4to. 300 copies printed. Walpole speaks of these in a letter to Mason dated 12 June, 1774; and he sends a copy of them to him, 27 May, 1775. Mrs. Crewe, the Amoret addressed, was the daughter of Fulke Greville, and the wife of J. Crewe. She was painted by Reynolds as an Alpine shepherdess.

Dorinda, a Town Eclogue. [By General Richard Fitzpatrick, brother of the Earl of Ossory.] [Plate of Strawberry Hill.] Strawberry-Hill: Printed by Thomas Kirgate. M.DCC.LXXV.

Pp., 8. 4to. 300 copies printed. "I shall send you soon Fitzpatrick's 'Town Eclogue,' from my own furnace. The verses are charmingly smooth and easy . . ." "P. S. Here is the Eclogue" (Letter to Mason, 12 June, 1774).

1778.

The Sleep-walker, a Comedy: in two Acts. Translated from the French [of M. Pont de Veyle], in March, M.DCC.LXXVIII. [By Lady Craven, afterwards Margravine of Anspach.] Strawberry-Hill: Printed by T. Kirgate, M.DCC.LXXVIII.

Pp. viii—56. 8vo. 75 copies printed. At the back of the Title is a quatrain by Walpole to Lady Craven, "on her Translation of the Somnambule." "I will send . . . for yourself a translation of a French play. . . . It is not for your reading, but as one of the Strawberry editions, and one of the rarest; for I have printed but seventy-five copies. It was to oblige Lady Craven, the translatress . . . " (Walpole to Cole, 22 Aug., 1778).

1779

A Letter to the Editor of the Miscellanies of Thomas Chatterton. Strawberry-Hill: Printed by T. Kirgate, M.DCC.LXXXIX.

Half-title; Title; and pp. 56 (last blank). 8vo. 200 copies printed. "1779. In the preceding autumn had written a defence of myself against the unjust aspersions in the Preface to the Miscellanies of Chatterton. Printed 200 copies at Strawberry Hill this January, and gave them away. It was much enlarged from what I had written in July" (Short Notes).

1780

The Lady Horatia Waldegrave on the Death of the Duke of Ancaster. [Verses by Mr. Charles Miller.] N. D.

Pp. 4 (last blank), dated at end "A D. 1779." 4to. 150 copies printed. "I enclose a copy of verses, which I have just printed at Strawberry, only a few copies, and which I hope you will think pretty. They were written three months ago by Mr. Charles Miller, brother of Sir John, on seeing Lady Horatia at Nuneham. The poor girl is better" (Walpole to Lady Ossory, 29 Jan., 1780). Lady Horatia Waldegrave was to have been married to the Duke of Ancaster, who died in 1779.

1781

The Muse recalled, an Ode, occasioned by the Nuptials of Lord Viscount Althorp and Miss Lavinia Bingham, eldest daughter of Charles Lord Lucan, March vi, M.DCC.LXXXI. By William Jones, Esq. (afterwards Sir William Jones). Strawberry-Hill: Printed by Thomas Kirgate, MDCCLXXI.

Title, pp. 8. 4to. 250 copies printed. There is a well-known portrait of Lavinia Bingham by Reynolds, in which she wears a straw hat with a blue ribbon.

A Letter from the Honourable Thomas Walpole, to the Governor and Committee of the Treasury of the Bank of England. Strawberry-Hill: Printed by Thomas Kirgate, M.DCC.LXXXI.

Title, and pp. 16 (last blank). 4to. 120 copies printed.

1784.

A Description of the Villa of Mr. Horace Walpole, youngest son of Sir Robert Walpole, Earl of Orford, at Strawberry Hill, near Twickenham, Middlesex. With an Inventory of the Furniture, Pictures, Curiosities, &c. Strawberry-Hill: Printed by Thomas Kirgate, M.DCC.LXXXIV.

Pp. iv—92. 27 plates. "Curiosities added since this Book was completed," pp. 93–94. "More Additions," pp. 95–6. 4to. 200 copies printed. "The next time he [Sir Horace Mann's nephew] visits you, I may be able to send you a description of my Galleria,—I have long been preparing it, and it is almost finished,—with some prints, which, however, I doubt, will convey no very adequate idea of it" (Walpole to Mann, 30 Sept., 1784). "In the list for which Lord Ossory asks, is the Description of this place; now, though printed, I have entirely kept it up [i. e., held it back], and mean to do so while I live." (Walpole to Lady Ossory, 15 Sept., 1787).

1785.

Hieroglyphic Tales. Schah Baham ne comprenoit jamais bien que les choses absurdes et hors de toute vraisemblance. Le Sopha, p. 5. Strawberry-Hill: Printed by T. Kirgate, MDCCLXXXV.

Pp. x—52 (last blank). 8vo. Walpole's own MS. note in the Dyce example says, "Only six copies of this were printed, besides the revised copy." "1772. This year, the last, and sometime before, wrote some Hieroglyphic Tales. There are only five" (Short Notes). "I have some strange things in my drawer, even wilder than the 'Castle of Otranto,' and called 'Hieroglyphic Tales,' but they were not written lately, nor in the gout, nor, whatever they may seem, written when I was out of my senses" (Walpole to Cole, 28 Jan., 1779). "This [he is speaking of Darwin's Botanic Garden] is only the Second Part; for, like my King's eldest daughter in the 'Hieroglyphic Tales,' the First Part is not born yet: no matter" (Walpole to the Miss Berrys, 28 April, 1789).

Essay on Modern Gardening, by Mr. Horace Walpole. [Strawberry Hill Bookplate.] Essai sur l'Art des Jardins Modernes, par M. Horace Walpole, traduit en François by M le Duc de Nivernois, en MDCCCLXXXIV. Imprimé à Strawberry-Hill, par T. Kirgate, MDCCCLXXXV.

Two titles; and pp. 95 (last blank). French and English text on opposite pages. 4to. 400 copies printed. "How may I send you a new book printed here? . . It is the translation of my 'Essay on Modern Gardens' by the Duc de Nivernois. . . You will find it a most beautiful piece of French, of the genuine French spoken by the Duc de la Rochefoucault and Madame de Sévigné, and not the metaphysical galimatias of La Harpe and Thomas, &c, which Madame du Deffand protested she did not understand. The versions of Milton and Pope are wonderfully exact and poetic and elegant, and the fidelity of the whole translation, extraordinary" (Walpole to Lady Ossory, 17 Sept., 1785).

1789

Bishop Bonner's Ghost. [By Hannah More.] [Plate of Strawberry Hill.] Strawberry-Hill: Printed by Thomas Kirgate, MDCCCLXXXIX.

Title and Argument, 2 leaves, pp. 4. 4to. 96 copies printed; 2 on brown paper. It was written when Hannah More ("my imprimée," as Walpole calls her) was on a visit to Dr. Beilby

Porteus, Bishop of London, at his palace at Fulham, June, 1789.
 "I will forgive all your enormities if you will let me print your poem. I like to filch a little immortality out of others, and the Strawberry press could never have a better opportunity" (Walpole to Hannah More, 23 June, 1789). "The enclosed copy of verses pleased me so much, that, though not intended for publication, I prevailed on the authoress, Miss Hannah More, to allow me to take off a small number. . . "I have been disappointed of the completion of 'Bonner's Ghost,' by my rolling press being out of order, and was forced to send the whole impression to town to have the copper-plate taken off." "Kirgate has brought the whole impression, and I shall have the pleasure of sending your Ladyship this with a 'Bonner's Ghost' to-morrow morning" (Walpole to Lady Ossory, 16-18 July, 1789).

The History of Alcidalis and Zelida. A Tale of the Fourteenth Century. [By Vincent de Voiture.] Printed at Strawberry-Hill. MDCCCLXXXIX.

Pp. 96 (last blank). 8vo. This is a translation of Voiture's unfinished Histoire d'Alcidalis et de Zelide. (See Nouvelles Œuvres de Monsieur de Voiture. Nouvelle Edition. A Paris, chez Louis Bilaine, au Palais, au second Pilier de la grand' Salle, à la Palme & au grand Cesar, MDCLXXII.) There is a copy in the Dyce Collection. Another was sold in 1823 with the books of John Trotter Brockett, in whose catalogue it was said to be "surreptitiously printed." Kirgate had a copy, although Baker does not mention it.

Doubtful Date.

Verses sent to Lady Charles Spencer [Mary Beauclerc] with a painted Taffety, occasioned by saying she was low in Pocket and could not buy a new Gown.

Single leaf. Baker says these were by Anna Chamber, Countess Temple.

Besides the above, Walpole printed at his press in 1770 Vols. i and ii of a 4to edition of his works.

INDEX.

INDEX.

- Ædes Walpolianæ, The*, 94, 95, 96, 329.
Amelia, the Princess, 207, 265, 275.
American Colonies, the war with the, 292, 332.
An Account of the Giants, 224.
Anecdotes of Painting, 174, 183, 253, 282, 335.
Ashe, Miss, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160.
Ashton, Thomas, 27, 28, 29, 76, 77.
Balmerino, Lord, trial and execution of, 116–122.
Beauclerk, Lady Diana, 192, 194, 229, 283, 300, 326.
Beauties, The, 128, 129.
Beauty Room, the, 249.
Benedict XIV., Pope, 65.
Bentley, Richard, 165, 166, 178, 180, 194, 253, 261.
Berry, the Misses Mary and Agnes, 274, 276, 285, 298,
299, 300, 301, 302, 304,
305, 308, 314, 315, 317, 325, 331, 334.
Bland, Henry, 22.
Bologna, visited by Walpole, 56, 57, 58.
Bracegirdle, Anne, 106, 107.
Burnet, Bishop Gilbert, 26, 255.
- Burney, Frances, 229, 297.
Byng, Admiral, 174, 175.
- Castle of Otranto, The*, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 200,
230.
Catalogue of Engravers, 188.
Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, 174, 182, 183, 185.
Catalogue of Strawberry Hill, 301.
Charles X. (Comte d'Artois), 209.
Chartreuse, La Grande, visited by Walpole and Gray, 53.
Chartreux, Convent of the, described by Walpole, 49, 50.
Chatterton, Thomas, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235.
Chesterfield, Philip Dormer
Stanhope, Earl of, 109, 160, 214; his Letters parodied by Walpole, 277.
Choiseul, Mme. la Duchesse de, 211, 213, 216, 250.
Christopher Inn, the, 27, 28.
Chudleigh, Elizabeth, Duchess of Kingston, 157, 267.
Churchill, Lady Mary (Maria), 64, 81, 85, 124, 248.
Chute, John, 67, 87, 146, 147, 148, 163, 208, 246.

- Clement XII., Pope, 60.
 Clinton, Henry, Earl of Lincoln, 71.
 Clive, Kitty, 106, 150, 162, 168, 175, 228; bon mot of, 217; allusions to, 252, 255; death of, 295.
 Cocchi, Dr. Antonio, 71.
 Coke, Lady Mary, 206.
 Cole, William, 23, 29, 139, 194, 244, 325.
 Congreve, William, 106.
 Conway, Henry, 23, 45, 50, 51, 53, 54, 106, 110, 114, 115, 116, 129, 136, 182, 218, 239.
 Cope, Gen. Sir John, 113.
 Crawford, James, 215.
 Culloden Moor, the battle of, 114, 116.
 Cumberland, William, Duke of, 30, 109, 114, 115, 123, 136, 149, 151, 207.
 Cunningham, Peter, 20; his account of a drive with Walpole, 264, 265, 266, 267; his specimens of Walpole's letters, 295; quoted, 250, 268, 324, 325.
 Damer, Anna (Miss Conway), 242, 283, 308.
 Deffand, Mme. du (Marie de Vichy-Chamron), 213, 250; Walpole's first impression of, 213, 214; her conquest of Walpole, 214; Walpole's letter to Gray concerning, 214, 215; her fondness for Walpole, 216; the episode of the snuff-box, 216; Walpole's second visit to, 222, 223; death of, 288, 292; Walpole's letters to, 288, 289; Walpole's adieu to, 291; will of, 292.
Delenda est Oxonia, 153.
 Dodington, Bubb, 116, 149.
 Dryden, John, imitated by Walpole, 78; claimed as great-uncle by Catherine Shorter, 249.
 Easton Neston (Northamptonshire), 33.
Epitaphium Vivi Auctoris, 304.
 Eton College, 21-27.
 Falkirk, the battle of, 114.
 Fielding, Henry, 98, 106, 193, 194, 267, 326.
 Fielding, William, 193.
 Florence, visited by Walpole and Gray, 58, 59, 60.
 Fontenoy, the battle of, 110, 111, 112, 128.
 Foote, Samuel, 210.
 Forcalquier, Mme. de, 211.
 Fortescue, Lucy, 129, 130.
 Fox, Charles James, his verses on Mrs. Crewe, 281.
 Franklyn, Richard, 140, 152.
 Fraser, Simon, Lord Lovat, 122.
 Frederick, Prince of Wales. (See Wales.)
 Freethinking in France, 204, 207.

- French Court, presentation of Walpole at the, 207, 208, 209.
- Garrick, David, 106, 169, 178, 221.
- Genlis, Stéphanie Félicité, Mme. de, 209, 296, 297.
- Geoffrin, Madame, 212, 218.
- George I., Walpole's visit to, 18, 19, 20; the story of the raven, 327. (See Reminiscences.)
- George II., 81. (See Reminiscences.)
- George III. (See Memoirs.)
- Goldsmith, Oliver, 30, 46, 129, 175, 176, 234, 282; Walpole's contempt for, 279, 326.
- Gordon Riots, the, 293.
- Granby, Lord, 158, 160.
- Gray, Thomas, at Eton, 26, 27, 30, 35; travels with Walpole, 43, 44, 46, 47; Versailles described by, 47, 48; at Rheims, 51; at Lyons, 52; at La Grande Chartreuse, 53; in Italy, 55, 56, 58, 59, 60, 61, 64, 66, 67, 68, 75; his misunderstanding with Walpole, 67, 68, 69, 70; subsequent reconciliation, 70, 163; praises Walpole's verse, 77; quoted, 36, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 51, 52, 56, 58, 66, 77, 106, 121, 130, 143, 163, 164, 166, 180, 181, 256; resumes his intimacy with Walpole, 127, 130, 210; visits Strawberry Hill, 163; his indebtedness to Walpole, 164; his Elegy published by Dodsley, 164; the Poemata-Grayeo-Bentleiana, 165; publication of the Odes at Strawberry Hill, 174, 180, 181; detects the Rowley forgeries, 232; portrait of, 252; Walpole's relations with, 326.
- Grenville, George, 331.
- Harrison, Audrey, Lady Townshend, 126, 189.
- Hawkins, Miss, 192, 284; her description of Walpole, 319, 320, 321.
- Hénault, Charles Jean François, President, 213, 219, 223, 231, 250.
- Hervey, Baron, 151; said to be Walpole's father, 14.
- Hervey, Lady, 149, 208, 211, 212, 240, 261.
- Hill, Robert, "the learned tailor," 182.
- Historic Doubts on Richard III.*, 225, 226, 277.
- Hogarth, William, 88, 98, 194, 253, 260, 282.
- Houghton, the seat of the Walpoles, 11, 34, 84, 85, 87, 88, 89, 90, 99; the Houghton pictures sold to Catherine of Russia, 87, 286, 287; Walpole buried at, 307.

- Hume, David, 204, 207, 217, 218, 219, 220.
 Hyde Park, robbers in, 153, 154.
 Inn, the Christopher, 27, 28.
Inscription for the Neglected Column, 79.
 Jennings, Frances, Duchess of Tyrconnell, anecdote of, 17; head of, 260.
 Jenyns, Soame, quoted, 155, 160.
 Jephson, Capt. Robert, 278, 279.
 Johnson, Samuel, 70, 107, 277, 326.
 Kendal, the Duchess of, 18, 265, 327.
 Ker, Lord Robert, 115.
 Kilmarnock, Earl, 115; trial and execution of, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122.
 King's College, Cambridge, 29, 30, 31, 42.
 Kirgate, Thomas, 183, 230, 276.
 Lens, Bernard, 30.
Lessons for the Day, 93.
Letter from Xo Ho, 175, 176, 177, 335.
 Louis XVI. (Duc de Berry), 209.
 Louis XVIII. (Comte de Provence), 209.
 Macaulay, Lord, 266; reviews Lord Dover's edition of Walpole's letters to Mann, 311, 312, 313; letters to Hannah Macaulay quoted, 313, 314; Lady Holland irritated by, 315; his opinion of Walpole, 316, 317.
 McLean, James, robs Walpole, 153, 154, 155; is imprisoned, 155; becomes a fashionable lion, 155; is executed, 155.
 Mann, Sir Horace, 58, 59, 62, 79, 87, 239, 294; death of, 295; Walpole's affection for, 326.
 Mason, Rev. William, 68, 232, 240.
Memoirs of the Reign of King George III., 224, 333.
 Middleton, Dr. Conyers, 327; praises Walpole's attainments, 76.
 Montagu, Lieut.-Gen. Charles, K. C. B., 24.
 Montagu, Brig.-Gen. Edward, 24.
 Montagu, George, M. P., 24, 27, 31, 43, 222, 239, 326.
 Montagu, Lady Mary Wortley, 14, 63, 162; described by Walpole, 64, 65, 67; quoted, 65, 127.
 Mont Cenis, 55.
 Moore, Edward, 160.
 More, Hannah, 297, 298, 303, 325.
 Müntz (German artist), 167, 174, 178, 249, 321.

- Mysterious Mother, The*, 225, 227, 228; Byron's praise of, 229; printed at the Strawberry Hill press, 230; illustrated by Lady Di Beauclerk, 284.
- Nature will Prevail*, 280.
- Neale, Betty, 159.
- Neuhoff, Baron ("Theodore, King of Corsica"), 161, 174.
- Nolkejumskoi. (See Cumberland, William, Duke of.)
- Officina Arbuteana. (See Strawberry Hill.)
- Orford, George, third Earl of (nephew of Horace Walpole), 87, 173, 240, 285, 286, 287, 302.
- Orford, Horace, fourth Earl of. (See Walpole, Horace.)
- Orford, Robert, first Earl of. (See Walpole, Sir Robert.)
- Orford, Robert, second Earl of. (See Walpole, Robert.)
- Ossory, Lady, 240; letters of Walpole to, 260, 274, 286, 287, 292, 299, 306, 307, 320.
- Paris, Walpole's first visit to, 45, 46; state of society in, 203, 204, 205; second visit to, 206, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216; third visit to, 222, 223, 224; fourth visit to, 289.
- Parish Register of Twickenham, The*, 191, 192, 194, 285.
- Parodies by Walpole, 96, 277.
- Patapan, 85.
- Petersham, Lady Caroline, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 326.
- Picture Gallery at Houghton, 87, 88, 89, 286, 287.
- Pinkerton, John: his Walpoliana quoted, 13, 20, 107, 258, 298, 321, 322, 323, 324; a favourite of Walpole, 296; his description of Walpole, 321, 322, 323, 324.
- Pomfret, Lady, 62, 63, 64, 65, 120.
- Pope, Alexander, 127, 137, 168, 254.
- Preston Pans, the battle of, 113.
- Prévost d'Exiles, M. l'Abbé Antoine François, 46.
- Prior, Matthew, criticised by Walpole, 94, 95.
- Pulteney, William, Earl of Bath, 81, 82, 184, 265.
- Quadruple Alliance, the, 24; ended, 29.
- Queensberry, the Duke of, 267.
- Quinault, Jeanne Françoise, 46.
- Radnor, Lord, his Chinese summer house, 148.
- Ranelagh Gardens, the, 107, 108, 109.

- Reminiscences of the Courts of George the I. and II.*, written for the Misses Berry, 301.
- Reynolds, Sir Joshua, 282.
- Richardson, Samuel, 204, 207.
- Robinson, William, 178, 179, 180, 183, 189.
- Rochford, Lady, 189, 190.
- Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 217, 218; sham letter from Frederick the Great to, 218, 219; anger of, 219; his quarrel with Hume, 220.
- Saint Cyr, Walpole's visit to, 223.
- Saunderson, Professor Nicholas, 30, 31.
- Scott, Samuel, 168.
- Scott, Sir Walter, his study of the Castle of Otranto, 198.
- Selwyn, George Augustus, 23, 166, 205, 267.
- Sermon on Painting, The*, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94.
- Shenstone, William, 182.
- Shirley, Lady Fanny, 192.
- Shirley, the Hon. Sewallis, 126, 127, 240.
- Shorter, Catherine (Lady Walpole), 13, 14, 248; death of, 35; burial of, 36; Dryden claimed as great uncle to, 249.
- Shorter, Sir John, Lord Mayor of London, 13.
- Short Notes*, Walpole's, quoted, 15, 21, 27, 50, 71, 100, 153, 173, 184, 224, 280.
- Skerret, Maria, 15, 64, 81, 248.
- Smollett, Tobias, 126, 130.
- Spence, Professor Joseph, 65, 70, 71, 182.
- Sterne, Laurence, 210.
- Strawberry Hill (Twickenham), Walpole removes to, 110; description of, 135–152, 178, 179, 246; previous tenants of, 138, 139; additions to, 139, 242, 243; the Gothic castle at, 141–148; views executed by Müntz, 167; private printing press at, 174, 177, 178, 180; described by William Robinson, 178, 179, 180; works published at the Officina Arbuteana, 180, 181, 182, 183 (see appendix), 188, 189; Description of the Villa at, 231, 239, 245; fêtes at, 243, 244; ground plan of the villa at, 247; China Closet and China Room at, 249; the Yellow Bedchamber (Beauty Room), 249; Breakfast Room, 250, 252; plan of principal floor, 251; Green Closet, 252; Library, 253; Blue Bedchamber, 252; Armoury, 253; the Red Bedchamber, 254; the Holbein Chamber, 254; the Star Chamber, 255; the Gallery, 243, 256; the Round Tower, 257; the Cabinet (Tribune), 258; collection of rarities, 258,

- 259, 260 ; the Great North Bedchamber, 245, 259 ; the Great Cloister, 261 ; the Chapel, 261 ; the Flower Garden, 140, 261 ; Gothicism of the villa, 262, 263 ; bequeathed to Mrs. Damer, 308 ; subsequent disposal of, 309.
- Stuart, Prince Charles Edward (the Chevalier), his descent on Scotland, 112, 120 ; temporary success of, 113, 114 ; escape of, 115.
- Stuart, Lady Louisa, her Introductory Anecdotes quoted, 14, 15, 16, 22, 23.
- Suffolk, the Countess of (Mrs. Howard), 19, 151, 168, 190, 240.
- Swift, Jonathan, 30, 127, 168.
- Townshend, Charles, Viscount, 16, 189.
- Townshend, Lady. (See Harry's son, Audrey.)
- Tragedy in England, Walpole's opinion of, 229, 230.
- Triumvirate, the, 24.
- Twickenham. (See Strawberry Hill.)
- Vane, Henry, Earl of Darlington, 157.
- Vauxhall, 109, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160.
- Versailles, visited by Walpole, 47, 207, 208, 209.
- Verses on the Suppression of the Late Rebellion*, 122, 123, 124.
- Vertuc, George, the engraver, 87, 88, 96, 186, 254.
- Voltaire, François Marie Arouet de, 214, 226.
- Wales, Frederick, Prince of, 35, 79, 109, 111 ; composes a chanson on the battle of Fontenoy, 111 ; wins £800 from Lord Granby, 160.
- Walpol, Sir Henry de, 11.
- Walpole, Dorothy, Lady Townshend, 16, 248.
- , Sir Edward, Knight of the Bath, 12.
- , Sir Edward (brother of Horace), 124, 125, 241 ; the daughters of, 241 ; death of, 296.
- , George (third Earl of Orford), 173, 240, 285, 286.
- , Horace (Horatio), his ancestry, 11, 12, 13 ; scandal regarding his birth, 13 ; early childhood, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 ; his visit to George I., 18 ; his appearance as a boy, 21 ; his schooldays at Eton, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27 ; his scholarship, 22, 30, 31 ; his companions at Eton, 23, 24, 26, 27 ; enters Lincoln's Inn, 27 ; enters King's College, Cambridge, 29 ; his university studies, 29, 30, 31 ;

the "triumvirate," 24; the "quadruple alliance," 24, 29; literary productions at Cambridge, 35; appointed Inspector of Imports and Exports, 41; becomes Usher of the Exchequer, Controller of the Pipe, and Clerk of the Estreats, 42; leaves college, 42; travels with Gray, 43; visits France, 44-54; in Switzerland, 54; crosses the Alps, 55; in Italy, 56-71; his description of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, 64; his misunderstanding with Gray, 67, 68, 69, 70; his illness in Florence, 70; his return to England, 71; becomes member of Parliament for Callington, 71; poetical Epistle to Thomas Ashton, 77, 78; praised by Gray, 77; his letters to Mann, 79, 84, 105; his first speech in Parliament, 82; his Sermon on Painting, 90, 91, 92, 93; the Ædes Walpolianæ, 94, 95, 96; his parodies, 96, 277; his paper against Lord Bath, 96; his father's death, 97, 98, 99; receives legacy from his father, 100; his criticism of Mrs. Woffington and of Garrick, 106; removes to Twickenham, 110; his Verses on the Suppression of the Late Rebellion, 122, 123, 124; epilogue to Tamerlane, 122; marriage of his sisters, 124; his criticism of Lady Orford, 125, 126; his contributions to The Museum, 128; his poem, The Beauties, 128, 129; resides at Windsor, 130; his description of Strawberry Hill, 135, 136, 137, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 179, 231, 244, 245, 263 (see Strawberry Hill); his papers in The Remembrancer, 153; his tract Delenda est Oxonia, 153; is robbed in Hyde Park, 153, 154, 155; his account of Vauxhall, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160; his papers in The World, 162; his reconciliation with Gray, 163; his admiration of Gray's poetry, 164, 165, 166; is chosen member of Parliament for Castle Rising, 173; for Lynn, 174; his Castle of Otranto, 174, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 205; publishes Gray's Odes, 174, 181; his Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, 174, 182, 183; his first Memoirs, 175; his Letter from Xo Ho, 175, 176, 177, 335; his other Catalogues, 177, 182,

188 ; establishes the Officina Arbuteana, 177 ; his publications, 182, 183, 184 (see appendix), 186, 187, 188, 198 ; his Catalogue of Engravers, 188 ; his Anecdotes of Painting, 185, 188, 282, 284 ; his occasional pieces (The Magpie and her Brood, Dialogue between two Great Ladies, The Garland, The Parish Register), 190, 191, 285 ; his second visit to Paris, 205, 206, 207, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216 ; is presented to the royal family, 207, 208, 209 ; sham letter to Rousseau, 218 ; visits Bath, 221 ; his third visit to Paris, 222 ; his Account of the Giants, 224 ; begins his Memoirs of the Reign of George III., 224 ; retires from Parliament, 225 ; his letters to the Public Advertiser, 225 ; his Historic Doubts on Richard III., 225, 226, 227 ; his tragedy, The Mysterious Mother, 225, 227, 228, 229 ; his relations with Chatterton, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235 ; his fondness for his nieces, 241 ; his correspondence, 276 ; his minor writings, 277, 278, 280 ; his Nature will Prevail, 280 ; his fourth visit to Paris, 289 ; his correspondence in French, 289 ; his farewell to Mme. du Deffand, 291 ; his acquaintance with Hannah More, 297 ; his friendship with the Misses Berry, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 304, 305, 325 ; his Reminiscences, 301 ; his Catalogue of Strawberry Hill, 301 ; succeeds his nephew as Earl of Orford, 302 ; his Epitaphium Vivi Auctoris, 304 ; his last letter to Lady Ossory, 306 ; his death and burial, 306 ; disposal of his estate, 308, 309 ; Lord Macaulay's criticism of, 315, 316, 317, 318 ; portraits and descriptions of, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322 ; Pinkerton's reminiscences of, 322, 323, 324 ; his character as a man, 325, 326, 327, 328 ; as a virtuoso, 328, 329, 330 ; as a politician, 330, 331, 332, 333 ; as an author, 334, 335, 336, 337.

 —— of Walterton, Horatio, Baron, 16, 257.
 ——, Maria (Lady Waldegrave), 241, 243.
 ——, Lady Mary (Countess of Cholmondeley), 85, 124.
 ——, Reginald de, 11.
 ——, Sir Robert (first Earl of Orford), ancestry of, 11, 12 ; first marriage of, 13 ; second marriage of, 64 ; decline of his political

- power, 79, 80; resigns the premiership, 81; is created Earl of Orford, 81; intrigues against Pulteney, 82; prevents his own disgrace, 83; death of, 97, 98, 99; will of, 100.
 ——, Robert (second Earl of Orford), 109, 127, 158.
 ——, Lady Robert (Countess of Orford), 63, 125, 126, 127, 240; death of, 295.
 ——, Col. Robert, M. P., 12.
 ——, William, 13.
 Walpoles of Houghton, pedigree of the, 11; spelled Walpol, 11.
Walpoliana, Pinkerton's, 13, 20, 107, 296, 298, 321, 322, 323, 324.
 Walsingham, Melusina de Schulemberg, Countess of, 19.
 Wesley, John, Walpole's description of, 221.
 West, Richard, 26, 27, 127.
 Whitehead, Paul, 168.
 Wilkes, John, 210.
 Williams, George James, 166, 205, 241.
 Williams, Sir Charles Hanbury, 23, 160.
 William Henry, Duke of Gloucester, marries Maria Walpole, 241.
 Woffington, Margaret, 106.
Xo Ho, Letter of, 175, 176, 177.
 Yarmouth, the Countess of (Mme. de Walmoden), 19.
 Zouch, Rev. Henry, 232; Walpole's letters to, quoted, 185, 186, 187, 325.

Deacidified using the Bookkeeper process
Neutralizing agent: Magnesium Oxide Treatment Date

DEC

2000

Preservation Technology
A WORLD LEADER IN PAPER PRESERVATION

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 007 322 838 4